> Upon motion of a child, a child's parent or custodian or the department alleging a change of circumstances requiring a different disposition, the court shall conduct a hearing . . . and may modify a dispositional order if the court finds by clear and convincing evidence a material change in circumstances and that such modification is in the child's best interests. . . .

[7]West Virginia Code § 49-6-6 was recodified, effective May 17, 2015, as West Virginia Code § 49-4-606 (2015), with minor modifications that do not affect the issues currently before this Court.

In her memorandum to the circuit court in support of her petition, the mother also cited West Virginia Code § 44-10-3 (2014). That statute also distinctly provides that a request for a termination of legal guardianship must be supported by evidence of a material change in circumstances and must serve the best interests of the child. Further, West Virginia Code § 44-10-3(j) specifies that the burden of proof is upon the movant, in this case, the child's mother. The relevant portion of that statute provides as follows:

> (i) The court, the guardian or the minor may revoke or terminate the guardianship appointment when:
> (4) A petition is filed by the guardian, the minor, a parent or an interested person or upon the motion of the court stating that the minor is no longer in need of the assistance or protection of a guardian due to changed circumstances and the termination of the guardianship would be in the minor's best interest.
> (j) For a petition to revoke or terminate a guardianship filed by a parent, the burden of proof is on the moving party to show by a preponderance of the evidence that there has been a material change of circumstances and that a revocation or termination is in the child's best interest.

W.Va. Code § 44-10-3(i)(4) and 44-10-3(j) (emphasis added). Additionally, Rule 46 of the West Virginia Rules for Child Abuse and Neglect is consistent with the statutory requirements and states that modification of a court order is permissible upon a showing of a material change in circumstances and clear and convincing evidence that modification is in the best interests of the child.

Based upon the rule and the statutory mandates outlined above, the December 12, 2013, disposition in this case, providing legal guardianship to the paternal grandparents, may be modified only if a circuit court finds both a change in circumstances and that modification is in the child's best interests. The petitioners argue that the record in this case reveals insufficient evidence to support a conclusion that returning the child to the mother is in his best interests. In presenting evidence on the best interests issue, the mother relied primarily on her status as the child's mother and the bond they had established. She did not identify any other significant evidence indicating that a modification of the custodial arrangements would be in the child's best interests. She argues on appeal that the GAL's recommendations should not be accorded significant weight because the GAL failed to view the interactions between the mother and the child. The mother also argues that the opinions of the child's school counselor, Mr. Paul Weigel, should be disregarded because Mr. Weigel was treating the child for unrelated issues at school and did not observe the mother/child relationship.[8] [8]The school issues prompting the therapy with Mr. Weigel involved an incident involving the child's behavior issues on the school bus and his inability to concentrate in his Kindergarten class. Mr. Weigel recommended that the child should remain with the grandparents due to the potential traumatic effects of separating him from his current caretakers. In her most recent October 2015 update to this Court, the GAL explained that the child is still engaged in therapy with Paul Weigel. Mr. Weigel informed the GAL that the child has responded well to the consistency of rules implemented by the grandparents in their

To the contrary, the grandparents, GAL, and DHHR adamantly contend that the circuit court erred in modifying the dispositional order based upon such extremely limited evidence that a modification would serve the best interests of the child. The DHHR asserts that while the mother unquestionably underwent a substantial and positive change in her own circumstances, there is a glaring absence of evidence that a modification of the disposition is in the child's best interests. The petitioners contend that the circuit court essentially ignored the key element of the best interests of the child and elevated the rights of the mother over those of the child.

Although this Court has observed that a circuit court has statutory authority to modify a guardianship, evidence regarding each of the two elements required by the statute must be presented. As explained above, both West Virginia Code § 49-6-6 and West Virginia Code § 44-10-3 clearly identify the two requirements for alteration of custody in this case. The significance of the best interests of the child cannot be overstated; it is a statutory requirement and has been repeatedly and strenuously emphasized by this Court. In syllabus point three of In re Katie S., 198 W.Va. 79, 479 S.E.2d 589 (1996), for instance, this Court explained: "Although parents have substantial rights that must be protected, the primary goal home. He also indicated that the child seem "bothered" about the most recent changes in the mother's living arrangements.

in cases involving abuse and neglect, as in all family law matters, must be the health and welfare of the children." See also Syl. Pt. 1, State ex rel. Cash v. Lively, 155 W.Va. 801, 187 S.E.2d 601 (1972) ("In a contest involving the custody of an infant the welfare of the child is the polar star by which the discretion of the court will be guided.") (internal citation omitted); Syl. Pt. 5, Carter v. Carter, 196 W.Va. 239, 470 S.E.2d 193 (1996) ("In visitation as well as custody matters, we have traditionally held paramount the best interests of the child.").

This Court also addressed these requirements in the specific context of a termination of guardianship in In re K.H., 235 W.Va. 254, 773 S.E.2d 20 (2015). In that case, this Court recognized that an analysis of the best interests of the child is imperative in matters involving modification of custody. This Court's evaluation of the guardianship issues in K.H. specified that the statutory scheme requires consideration of the change in circumstances, as well as the best interests of the child. Id. at 258, 773 S.E.2d at 24; see also In re Haylea G., 231 W.Va. 494, 745 S.E.2d 532 (2013) (examining grounds for termination of legal guardianship). The statutes and rule prohibit modification of an existing guardianship in the absence of evidence that the child's best interests will be served by the modification and that there has been a change in circumstances.

Upon review of the present case, this Court finds the evidentiary record insufficient to support a conclusion that S.W.'s best interests would be served by modifying the disposition and terminating the paternal grandparents' legal guardianship.[9] Were this simply a question of the safety and welfare of this child, this Court would be compelled to conclude that the evidence indicates that both the mother and the paternal grandparents would be stable and venerable caretakers for this child. But, that is not the question before this Court. The statutes and rule prohibit a modification of the disposition in this case in the absence of a showing that the child's best interests would be served by altering the status quo. We commend the mother on her extremely substantial success in conquering her addiction issues, and we encourage her meaningful and extensive involvement in the life of her son. At this juncture, however, there is insufficient evidence to indicate that an alteration in the custody arrangements would be in the best interests of the child. He is entitled to a sense of stability and permanency in his life. This Court has consistently emphasized the importance of achievement of permanency to the greatest degree possible. See In re: Isaiah A., 228 W.Va. 176, 718 S.E.2d 775 (2010); In re: Jonathan G., 198 W.Va. 716, 482 S.E.2d 893 (1996); *State ex rel. [9]This Court observes that the abuse and neglect statute at issue here, West Virginia Code § 49-6-6, requires clear and convincing evidence that the best interests of the child will be served by the modification. Rule 46 of the West Virginia Rules for Child Abuse and Neglect also requires clear and convincing evidence. The statute addressing a termination of legal guardianship, however, requires only a preponderance of the evidence on the issue of best interests. See W.Va. Code § 44-10-3. We find that the evidence on that issue in this case is insufficient to meet either of those evidentiary standards.

Brian D., 194 W.Va. 623, 461 S.E.2d 129 (1995).[10]

As revealed in the record, the home provided for this young boy by his paternal grandparents has been the only stable home he has known. The circuit court order did not identify any factors indicating that termination of the guardianship would be in the child's best interests, basing the conclusion primarily upon the mother's change in circumstances. The petitioners emphasize the fact that the mother was asked to address the issue of how removing the child from his grandparents would serve the child's best interests. She responded by saying that a child should be with his mother, but she did not offer evidence on issues which might impact the best interests analysis. For instance, she was unaware of issues such as whether the child would have to change schools if custody were to be transferred. The record is devoid of sufficient evidence indicating that alteration of custody would serve the child's best interests at this time.

Based upon the foregoing, we reverse the April 1, 2015, order of the circuit court.[11] On remand to the circuit court, the rights of the mother and maternal grandparents to visitation with the child should be specifically established. As in other child custody matters, the visitation schedule will be subject to modification as circumstances warrant and as the child advances in age.[12]

The visitation schedule should provide extensive contact between the child and his mother and "should give due consideration to . . . work and home schedules and to the parameters of the child's daily school and home life, and should be developed in a manner intended to foster the emotional adjustment" of the child "while not unduly disrupting the lives of the parties or the [child]." Honaker v. Burnside, 182 W.Va. 448, 452, 388 S.E.2d 322, 325 (1989). This Court also explained in Honaker:

> [u]ndoubtedly, ... [the child's] best interests must be the primary standard by which we determine [the child's] rights to continued contact with other significant figures in [the child's] life. Clearly, "these interests are interests of the child and not of the parent. Visitation is, to be sure, a benefit to the adult who is granted visitation rights with a child. But it is not the adult's benefit about which the courts are concerned. It is the benefit of the child that is vital."

alternative arguments.

[12]The mother's continued recovery efforts will obviously have an impact on her rights to visitation and the potential expansion of those rights. If she suffers a relapse into drug abuse, the visitation schedule should be modified, within the discretion of the circuit court.

> the plan for these coming months, however, its success and indeed the chances for [the child's] future happiness and emotional security will rely heavily on the efforts of these . . . [caretakers]. The work that lies ahead for . . . them is not without inconvenience and sacrifice on both sides. Their energies should not be directed even partially at any continued rancor at one another, but must be fully directed at developing compassion and understanding for one another, as well as showing love and sensitivity to the [child's] feelings at a difficult time in all their lives.

Id. at 453, 388 S.E.2d at 326-27. Fortunately, this appears to be a situation in which all parties are cooperating remarkably well to provide emotional security for the child, and we encourage the continuation of this unity of effort for the benefit of the child.

IV. Conclusion

The April 1, 2015, order of the Circuit Court of Brooke County is reversed, and this matter is remanded with directions for the entry of an order establishing visitation rights for the mother and maternal grandparents.

Reversed and remanded with directions.

SYLLABUS BY THE COURT

1. "Although conclusions of law reached by a circuit court are subject to de novo review, when an action, such as an abuse and neglect case, is tried upon the facts without a jury, the circuit court shall make a determination based upon the evidence and shall make findings of fact and conclusions of law as to whether such child is abused or neglected. Per Curiam:[1]

This case presents for review the issue of grandparent visitation rights, which stems from an underlying abuse and neglect case involving the biological parents.[2] The intervenors below and appellants herein, the paternal grandparents, Larry S.[3] and Debra S. (hereinafter "Larry" and/or "Debra" or "paternal grandparents"), were granted physical custody of the subject children and have started the process to adopt them.[4] Larry and Debra appeal from an order entered June 28, 2007, by the Circuit Court of Mingo County. By that order, the circuit court granted unsupervised visitation to the maternal grandparents, John T. and Mabel T. (hereinafter "John" and/or "Mabel" or "maternal grandparents").[5] On appeal to this Court, Larry and Debra argue that all of the evidence, including that submitted by mental health experts, illustrates that visitation with the maternal grandparents is harmful to the children and not in the children's best interests. Thus, the paternal grandparents seek the reversal of that portion of the circuit court's June 28, 2007, order that allows unsupervised visitation between the children and the maternal grandparents, and further ask that the visitation rights of John and Mabel be terminated. Based on the parties' arguments, the record designated for our consideration, and the pertinent authorities, we affirm that portion of the June 28, 2007, circuit court order that is unrelated to the visitation rights of the maternal grandparents, John and Mabel. Further, we reverse that portion of the June 28, 2007, circuit court order that allows unsupervised visitation by the maternal grandparents, John and Mabel. Finally, we remand this case to the Circuit Court of Mingo County for entry of an order terminating the visitation rights of the maternal grandparents, John and Mabel, consistent with this opinion.

[1]Pursuant to an administrative order entered on September 11, 2008, the Honorable Thomas E. McHugh, Senior Status Justice, was assigned to sit as a member of the Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia commencing September 12, 2008, and continuing until the Chief Justice determines that assistance is no longer necessary, in light of the illness of Justice Joseph P. Albright.

[2]The biological parents' rights were terminated on July 18, 2005. The termination is not an issue in this appeal.

FACTUAL AND PROCEDURAL HISTORY

This case has a long legal history that began when the family moved from Kentucky to West Virginia. The Department of Health and Human Resources (hereinafter "DHHR") opened a case in December 2004 as a result of a request from Kentucky, which had an open case involving Joe S. and Faye S. (hereinafter "Joe" and/or "Faye" or "biological parents") and their two girls, Samantha S. (hereinafter "Samantha") and Hope S. (hereinafter "Hope"), to monitor the family when they relocated to Mingo County, West Virginia. On March 10, 2005, the DHHR filed an emergency petition seeking immediate removal of Samantha and Hope[6] from the custody of their parents.[7] The Circuit Court of Mingo County reviewed the petition, removed the children from the custody of their biological parents, gave legal custody to the DHHR and awarded physical custody to the maternal grandparents, John and Mabel.

A preliminary hearing was held on March 15, 2005; wherein, the circuit court found probable cause to support the allegations of abuse and neglect. The trial court found continued physical custody with John and Mabel to be in the best interests of the children, and ordered a preadjudicatory improvement period for both parents. Thereafter, the improvement period was extended, with the directive that the biological parents undergo a substance abuse evaluation.

At an adjudicatory hearing on June 14, 2005, the circuit court found that the biological parents had failed to adhere to the terms of their improvement period and were once again incarcerated. Thus, the circuit court revoked the preadjudicatory improvement period. The circuit court additionally permitted the maternal grandparents, John and Mabel, to relinquish physical custody of the children to the DHHR[8] to facilitate the placement of the children in the physical custody of their paternal grandparents, Larry and Debra.

[6]Samantha and Hope are sisters. Their respective birth dates are January 6, 2000; and June 5, 2001.

[7]The petition alleged that the young children could not protect themselves from the negative behaviors of the parents. The alleged negative behaviors included repeated domestic violence incidents between the parents, drug use by the parents in front of the children, and the parents' failure to cooperate with recommended community services to remedy the problematic behaviors.

Subsequently, in a dispositional hearing of July 18, 2005, the circuit court terminated the parental rights of the mother and recognized the father's voluntary relinquishment of his parental rights. The circuit court awarded the mother post-termination visitation with the children. The circuit court also awarded Larry and Debra, the paternal grandparents, legal and physical custody of the children in consideration of how well the children were doing in their home and in recognition of the recommendations of the DHHR and the Guardian Ad Litem that the children remain there due to the stable structure Larry and Debra could provide. The circuit court granted John and Mabel grandparent visitation. In granting grandparent visitation to John and Mabel, the circuit court recognized that they had initially been uncooperative with the DHHR, failing to submit financial records when requested and failing to complete the ordered psychological evaluations. The court also noted that John and Mabel had violated a court order in allowing the children to have contact with their mother by phone while she was incarcerated.[9] However, the circuit court reasoned

[8]From the record, the reason for the relinquishment of custody is unclear. However, it appears that John and Mabel considered it to be a temporary placement.

[9]The circuit court had found that a visitation schedule with the mother was not to be implemented until after she was released from jail.

that John and Mabel were now being more cooperative, and were building a new home to address the size and safety concerns raised by the DHHR's study. The visitation by John and Mabel was ordered to be supervised by Larry and Debra, the paternal grandparents, until such time as John and Mabel's new home was completed. Then, the visitation would occur at John and Mabel's new home, would include overnight visits, and would be unsupervised.

A judicial review was conducted by the circuit court on November 7, 2005. At this hearing, it was learned that John and Mabel had not exercised their granted supervised visitation. They stated that they preferred to wait until their new home was completed and they could begin unsupervised visitation. Another judicial review was held on February 6, 2006. It is clear that some level of visitation was being exercised by John and Mabel by this point because, during this hearing, the Guardian Ad Litem reported that John and Mabel were making inappropriate comments to the children and threatening that they would not be allowed to return to Larry and Debra if they did not behave during their visits with John and Mabel.[10]

On May 8, 2006, a review hearing was held. The DHHR moved to terminate the unsupervised visitation of John and Mabel on the grounds that the children were experiencing significant difficulty and behavioral problems following visits with their maternal grandparents. At an evidentiary hearing held on the motion, Dr. Pam Ryan, the children's psychologist, testified that the unsupervised visitation with John and Mabel should cease. Dr. Ryan explained that the unsupervised visitation was the direct stressor leading to the children's problem behaviors. She testified that Hope disclosed that a boy in the neighborhood, who was later found to be John and Mabel's grandson, repeatedly exposed himself to her and that Mabel did nothing about it when Hope reported it to her. Dr. Ryan further noted that John and Mabel had permitted, against court order,[11] phone contact with the children by Faye while she was incarcerated. Regarding Samantha, Dr. Ryan reported that she had been hospitalized at Highland Hospital for seven days after she purposefully killed a kitten by throwing it against a wall. Dr. Ryan found this behavior consistent with the stabbing behavior that Samantha exhibited during play therapy. The circuit court further heard testimony from a worker with Child Protective Services (hereinafter "CPS"), who stated that she had prepared a protection plan in response to the allegations of the boy exposing himself to the girls, but that John had refused to sign the plan. The CPS worker recommended that unsupervised visitation be terminated. The court also heard testimony from John and Mabel. John and Mabel's testimony minimized any unsettling behavior by the girls, and denied any sexually inappropriate conduct by their grandson toward the girls.

[10]Mental health experts opined that this type of comment created panic and anxiety in the children as they feared they would not be allowed to return to the home of Larry and Debra.

[11]See supra note 9.

The testimony by John and Mabel was very emotional and stated their desire to have the girls in their lives.

Upon conclusion of the evidence, the circuit court ordered that unsupervised visitation be stopped pending further order of the court and further psychological testing of the grandparents. The circuit court also ordered a schedule of supervised visitation with John and Mabel to commence and ordered additional psychological evaluations of Samantha and Hope. The DHHR was granted legal custody of the girls to effectuate the adoption of the children by Larry and Debra, in whose physical custody they remained. Finally, the circuit court ordered the parties to return at a later date, after completion of the psychological testing, for further discussion of what type or amount of visitation would be in the best interests of the children.

The subsequent psychological evaluations agreed with the recommendations of Dr. Ryan, and concluded that the children exhibited maladaptive behaviors likely to escalate if they were not residing in a structured home with immediate consequences and consistent support. The psychologist noted serious and concerning behaviors in Samantha that might be reactive to the upheavals in her life. In evaluating the differing parenting approaches taken by the grandparents, the psychologist noted that John and Mabel seemed to minimize maladaptive behaviors of the children while Larry and Debra voiced concern and attempted to obtain mental health treatment for the children. The psychologist further expressed concern regarding John's adamant dislike of Samantha being prescribed psychotropic medication and regarding Mabel's lack of concern surrounding the alleged inappropriate behavior by her grandson which might lead to a failure to protect her granddaughters from sexual abuse. The psychologist concluded that John would likely continue to engage in negative behaviors, including speaking of the paternal grandparents in very negative terms, without supervision during visits. This behavior would perpetuate continued confusion in his granddaughters. It was also noted that the children's worst behavior was always exhibited after visitation with John and Mabel, indicating the visits as the significant stressor in the lives of the children. The psychologist stated that "[t]heir [Samantha and Hope's] placement in an adoptive home where the severity of their potential behaviors can be appreciated will be critical to their overall well-being and long-term development."

Another judicial review was conducted on June 28, 2007, to examine the placement of the children and discuss the findings of the psychological report. The circuit court found that continued placement of the children in the home of Larry and Debra was in the best interests of the children and stated in its order that

> [a]fter reviewing the Psychological Evaluations the Court again FINDS that the children should be placed with [Larry and Debra], as set forth in the Court[']s Final Dispositional Order. The psychologist stated "the . . . children vacillating between two homes with different attitudes, expectations, routines and discipline can be very detrimental to their development. Placement in an adoptive home where the severity of their > behavior is appreciated will be critical to their overall long-term development. Specifically, Samantha is anticipated to flourish most when her behavior is attended to, properly addressed and consistently punished/reinforced. Failure on any adult's part to recognize the potential threats this child has around others, as well as animals, may result in future injuries. Throughout the course of this evaluation and that of parental fitness assessments also completed in our office, the [paternal grandparents, Larry and Debra] have displayed a greater sense of awareness and sincere appreciation of their granddaughters' problematic issues. Their compliance with psychiatric treatment and counseling and the initiation of immediate professional intervention in times of crisis for Samantha have been evidenced."

Further, the circuit court's order went on to state that

> In regards to the [maternal grandparents, John and Mabel,] the psychologists stated that although [their] intentions with their granddaughters are well intended, [they] do not appreciate how disruptive, confusing, and emotionally painful it is for their granddaughters to be torn between grandparents all the while trying to resolve their feelings about their own parents. The psychologist stated that [they] refuse to accept the fact that the children have serious problems and blame any problems on [Larry and Debra]. The psychologist also stated that [the maternal grandparents] would have problems educating the children and providing for their emotional development.

However, despite these findings and against the advice of all of the mental health experts, the DHHR, and the Guardian Ad Litem, the circuit court found that it "would be in the best interests of the children to modify the previous dispositional order and to have unsupervised visitation with the [maternal grandparents][.]" John and Mabel, the maternal grandparents, were allowed unsupervised visitation with the children every other Friday from 6:00 p.m. until 1:00 p.m. Saturday. The court made this finding without further explanation of its reversal of supervised visitation, and in contravention of the unanimous recommendations by all experts and by the DHHR that visitation with John and Mabel be terminated. The current appeal to this Court was filed by Larry and Debra, the paternal grandparents, seeking a reversal of the circuit court's order entered June 28, 2007, granting John and Mabel unsupervised visitation.

The children's Guardian Ad Litem, Diana Carter Wiedel, has recommended that the children remain with Larry and Debra and that they be adopted by them.[12] She further recommends that any visitation with John and Mabel be at the discretion of the children and Larry and Debra, and with the approval of the children's psychologist. Otherwise, she feels that it is unlikely that visitation with the maternal grandparents, John and Mabel, is in the best interests of the children.

Subsequent to the filing of the petition for appeal before this Court, at the latest judicial review conducted on September 24, 2007, the circuit court inquired into the status of the case and was informed that the children continued to do well with Larry and Debra but that John and Mabel had refused to exercise any visitation because they believed it was not sufficient and was confusing to the children. John and Mabel were reported to have not seen the children from the first part of June 2007 through the date of the review hearing. Upon motion of the DHHR, the circuit court, by order entered October 12, 2007, terminated all visitation due to lack of participation by John and Mabel. The court also continued placement of the children in the home of Larry and Debra for finalization of the adoption. John and Mabel did not appeal from this ruling terminating their grandparent visitation.[13]

II.

STANDARD OF REVIEW

This case is before this Court on appeal from the circuit court's order granting the maternal grandparents, John and Mabel, unsupervised visitation with the children against the recommendations of all of the mental health experts, the children's Guardian Ad Litem, and the DHHR. While the case before this Court requires a determination of grandparent visitation rights, it began as a child abuse and neglect proceeding. We previously explained that, in the realm of an abuse and neglect case,

> [a]lthough conclusions of law reached by a circuit court are subject to de novo review, when an action, such as an abuse and neglect case, is tried upon the facts without a jury, the circuit court shall make a determination based upon the evidence and shall make findings of fact and conclusions of law as to whether such child is abused or neglected. These findings shall not be set aside by a reviewing court unless clearly erroneous. A finding is clearly erroneous when, although there is evidence to support the finding, the reviewing court on the entire evidence is left with the definite and firm conviction that a mistake has been committed. However, a reviewing court may not overturn a finding simply because it would have decided the case differently, and it must affirm a finding if the circuit court's account of the evidence is plausible in light of the record viewed Further, as a general guideline in light of the fact that this case requires us to review a decision made on grandparent visitation, we have held that "'[t]his Court reviews the circuit court's final order and ultimate disposition under an abuse of discretion standard. We review challenges to findings of fact under a clearly erroneous standard; conclusions of law are reviewed de novo.' Syl. Pt. 4, Burgess v. Porterfield, 196 W. Va. 178, 469 S.E.2d 114 (1996)." Syl. pt. 1, Napoleon S. v. Walker, 217 W. Va. 254, 617 S.E.2d 801 (2005). Mindful of these applicable standards, we now consider the substantive issues raised herein.

III.

DISCUSSION

On appeal to this Court, Larry and Debra agree with the circuit court's decision to grant them physical custody of Samantha and Hope pending their adoption of them. However, Larry and Debra disagree with the lower court's order awarding the maternal grandparents unsupervised visitation, and seek a termination of visitation by the maternal grandparents in the interests of fostering a permanent placement for Samantha and Hope that is in their best interests.

The DHHR agrees with Larry and Debra and takes the position that it is not in the best interests of Samantha and Hope to have visitation with John and Mabel, and that such visitation should be terminated.[14] In its brief, the DHHR further argues that the appeal has been rendered moot by the circuit court's subsequent order entered October 12, 2007, which terminated all visitation with John and Mabel. However, during oral argument before this Court, the DHHR recanted its position on the mootness issue and urged this Court to address the substantive issue of the grandparent visitation as an important issue to this case and to provide guidance for future cases. We do not find that this case has been rendered moot by the October 12, 2007, order;[15] therefore, we will now turn to the substantive issue

[14]Even though the maternal grandparents' visitation is at issue, John and Mabel did not file any pleadings with this Court in response to Larry and Debra's petition for appeal from the June 28, 2007, circuit court order. Moreover, John and Mabel have not challenged the subsequent ruling by the circuit court that terminated their visitation rights. See supra note 5 and infra note 15.

[15]We recognize that this Court has stated that "'[a] case is not rendered moot even though a party to the litigation has had a change in status such that he no longer has a legally cognizable interest in the litigation or the issues have lost their adversarial vitality, if such issues are capable of repetition and yet will evade review.' Syl. pt. 1, State ex rel. M.C.H. v. Kinder, 173 W. Va. 387, 317 S.E.2d 150 (1984)." Syl. pt. 1, State ex rel. J.D.W. v. Harris, 173 W. Va. 690, 319 S.E.2d 815 (1984). However, the issue of mootness is not relevant to our decision insofar as the circuit court was without authority to enter the October 12, 2007, order. We have previously explained that of the grandparent visitation and the permanency of the children's placement.

In assessing grandparents' visitation rights, this Court has always emphasized that the best interests of the children are paramount and must be afforded due deference. The emotional complexities of the instant case are enormous. While under the umbrella of a case where the children have been adjudged to be neglected and/or abused, the trial court judge terminated the parental rights of the biological parents and contended with the issue of grandparent visitation, all the while trying to maintain the children in the best environment

S.E.2d 241 (1961). We note that Rule 50 of the Rules of Procedure for Child Abuse and Neglect Proceedings does allow a circuit court to exercise its discretion to consider ancillary matters that are not directly pending before this Court, and to enter an order thereon. Rule 50 states:

> The filing of a petition for appeal does not operate to automatically stay the proceedings or orders of the circuit court in abuse, neglect, and/or termination of parental right cases, but the circuit court or the Supreme Court of Appeals may grant a stay upon a showing of good cause. Any party seeking a stay from the Supreme Court of Appeals pending an appeal of neglect, abuse, and/or termination of parental rights cases shall submit a written motion for the stay and a brief statement explaining the need for the stay, discussing the effect of the stay on the ability of the circuit court to plan for the child and on the best interests of the child. This rule shall not preclude any motion to the circuit court for a stay which includes a brief statement of the issues previously set forth.

Therefore, the appeal to this Court to evaluate the grant of unsupervised visitation to John and Mabel is not moot because the circuit court did not have the authority to enter the October 12, 2007, order while the specific issue addressed in that order is pending before this Court.

for them. It is very clear in the hearing transcripts that the maternal grandparents, John and Mabel, truly love their granddaughters, Samantha and Hope. John and Mabel both described their former relationships with their granddaughters, pleaded to have their "babies" back and asserted that they would do anything needed to be able to maintain a relationship with the girls. While it is understandable that such a plea would not be viewed lightly by the circuit court, it is unfathomable to elevate the desires of the grandparents seeking visitation over the best interests of the children involved, especially in contravention of all of the evidence in the case as to the best interests of the children. In recognizing that Samantha and Hope had formed a bond with their maternal grandparents, John and Mabel, the circuit court's order failed to recognize that, according to all of the expert evidence presented, that attachment had a negative effect on the children.

W. Va. Code § 48-10-501 (2006) (Supp. 2008) provides that "[t]he circuit court or family court shall grant reasonable visitation to a grandparent upon a finding that visitation would be in the best interests of the child and would not substantially interfere with the parent-child relationship." We have previously explained, "while the [Grandparent Visitation Act] affords certain protections to the grandparent, it is in no measure a guarantee of the right to visitation. The best interests of the child must be given greatest priority, and the rights of the child are superior to those of the grandparent seeking visitation." Mary Jean H. v. Pamela Kay R., 198 W. Va. 690, 693, 482 S.E.2d 675, 678 (1996) (per curiam). Further, "[a] trial court, in considering a petition of a grandparent for visitation rights with a grandchild or grandchildren . . . shall give paramount consideration to the best interests of the grandchild or grandchildren involved." Syl. pt. 1, in part, In re the Petition of Nearhoof, 178 W. Va. 359, 359 S.E.2d 587 (1987). See also Syl. pt. 4, State ex rel. David Allen B. v. Sommerville, 194 W. Va. 86, 459 S.E.2d 363 (1995) ("'In a contest involving the custody of an infant the welfare of the child is the polar star by which the discretion of the court will be guided.' Syl. pt. 1, State ex rel. Cash v. Lively, 155 W. Va. 801, 187 S.E.2d 601 (1972).").

All jurisprudence in this State dictates that the best interests of the children is the paramount concern guiding the circuit court's decisions. For evaluating whether grandparent visitation would be in the best interests of the child, the Legislature has compiled thirteen factors for the circuit judge to consider.[16] In the present case, the circuit court found

> (5) The effect that such visitation will have on the relationship between the child and the child's parents or the person with whom the child is residing;
> (6) If the parents are divorced or separated, the custody and visitation arrangement which exists between the parents with regard to the child;
>
> (7) The time available to the child and his or her parents, giving consideration to such matters as each parent's employment schedule, the child's schedule for home, school and community activities, and the child's and parents' holiday and vacation schedule;
> (8) The good faith of the grandparent in filing the motion or petition;

> (10) Whether the child has, in the past, resided with the grandparent for a significant period or periods of time, with or without the child's parent or parents; with the goal of adoption. The June 28, 2007, order further found that it would be in the best interests of the children to modify the previous dispositional order and for the children to have unsupervised visitation with John and Mabel so long as all the previously ordered conditions are met. In making these findings, the circuit court order referenced the psychologists' findings that "[John and Mabel] do not appreciate how disruptive, confusing, and emotionally painful it is for their granddaughters to be torn between grandparents all the while trying to resolve their feelings about their own parents." The judge further acknowledged the psychologists' conclusion that John and Mabel "refuse to accept the fact that the children have serious problems . . . and that [John and Mabel] would have problems educating the children and providing for their emotional development." Additionally, the judge adopted the psychologists' statement that "[t]he problems exhibited by the children in [Larry and Debra's] home are unlikely to abate if placed in [John and Mabel's] household and may even escalate given another change in their environment and security. Given both [John and Mabel's] skepticism that actual problems exist, they will be unlikely to effectively deal with issues the children may have emotionally." The lower court ultimately concluded that these dispositions, i.e. physical custody to Larry and Debra and granting unsupervised visitation to John and Mabel, were the least restrictive alternatives and in the best interests of the children.
> (11) Whether the grandparent has, in the past, been a significant caretaker for the child, regardless of whether the child resided inside or outside of the grandparent's residence;

While the lower court appears to have considered all of the psychologists' reports and the arguments made by all parties in reaching its decision, there are several deficits in the June 28, 2007, order that merit further consideration. First, there is a failure to analyze any of the thirteen factors delineated by the Legislature in W. Va. Code § 48-10-502 as a prerequisite for an award of grandparent visitation. Among these factors are significant issues that the circuit court failed to consider including the effect that the visitation would have on the relationship between the children and the paternal grandparents, with whom they are residing; any history of physical, emotional or sexual abuse or neglect being performed, procured, assisted, or condoned by the maternal grandparents; the preference of the parents, or the paternal grandparents in this case, with regard to the requested visitation; and any other factors relevant to the best interests of the children.[17] Larry and Debra noted in their brief the numerous failures of John and Mabel to comply with the various case plan requirements and court orders, including failure to turn over financial information when asked, failure to sign an emergency plan devised by the CPS worker after the girls reported John and Mabel's grandson had exposed himself to them, and the failure to sever communication between the girls and their mother while she was incarcerated. These behaviors have not demonstrated the maternal grandparents' good faith in adhering to the procedures designed for the best interests of their grandchildren. Additionally, the children's psychologists have noted the negative impact that unsupervised visitation has had on the children's behavior after their visits with John and Mabel and that this behavior has spilled over into their time with Larry and Debra. One of the concerns noted by the psychologists involved was the negative remarks and attitude of John towards Larry and Debra, and the confusion it causes for the children. Further, the judge failed to consider the adopting grandparents' desire that any visitation with John and Mabel be terminated. Finally, the order does not discuss the fact that everyone involved, with the exception of John and Mabel, recognized that unsupervised visitation was not in the best interests of the children.

[17]This Court, in light of the Troxel v. Granville, 530 U.S. 57, 70, 120 S. Ct. 2054, 147 L.Ed.2d 49 (2000), decision, has noted that the "'court must accord at least some special weight to the parent's own determination'" in assessing the amount of weight that should attach to the factor of parental preference. In re Grandparent Visitation of Cathy L. (R.) M. v. Mark Brent R., 217 W. Va. 319, 617 S.E.2d 866 (2005) (per curiam) (quoting State ex rel. Brandon L. v. Moats, 209 W. Va. 752, 763, 551 S.E.2d 674, 685 (2001).

The June 28, 2007, order allowed visitation with John and Mabel "so long as all previously ordered conditions are complied with." However, the judge did not specify the previous conditions to which he was referring. The only other conditions of record were the specifications that the children, along with John and Mabel, be evaluated by psychologists to determine if unsupervised visitation was proper. The psychologists concluded that unsupervised visitation would not be in the best interests of the children. As a result, there have been no conditions placed on the visitation with John and Mabel that would mitigate the negative behaviors which affect the children.

Rule 15 of the West Virginia Rules of Procedure for Child Abuse and Neglect Proceedings provides that "the court shall consider whether or not the granting of visitation would interfere with the child's case plan and the overall effect granting or denying visitation will have on the child's best interest." The evidence presented by the DHHR, Guardian Ad

Litem, two separate sets of psychological reviews, as well as the preferences of the pending adoptive parents clearly shows that visitation with John and Mabel is not in the best interests of the children.

Recognizing that visitation with the maternal grandparents is not in the best interests of the children, we wish to make clear that the maternal grandparents' visitation rights are permanently terminated. Statutory law recognizes the ability of the courts to terminate grandparent visitation in accordance with the best interests of the child standard. W. Va. Code § 48-10-1001 (2006) (Supp. 2008) states that "[a]ny circuit court or family court that grants visitation rights to a grandparent shall retain jurisdiction throughout the minority of the minor child with whom visitation is granted to modify or terminate such rights as dictated by the best interests of the minor child." In the present case, the visitation rights of the maternal grandparents are terminated as dictated by the best interests of the children, Samantha and Hope.

As a final matter, counsel for Larry and Debra argues that permanent placement for these children has not occurred within eighteen months of the final dispositional hearing as required by Rule 43 of the West Virginia Rules of Procedure for Child Abuse and Neglect Proceedings, which states that "[p]ermanent placement of each child shall be achieved within eighteen (18) months of the final disposition order, unless the court specifically finds on the record extraordinary reasons sufficient to justify the delay." Arguably, the grandparent visitation issue and the petition for appeal to this Court might justify some measure of delay; however, we are mindful that "[c]hild abuse and neglect cases must be recognized as being among the highest priority for the courts' attention. Unjustified procedural delays wreak havoc on a child's development, stability and security." Syl. pt. 1, in part, In the Interest of Carlita B., 185 W. Va. 613, 408 S.E.2d 365 (1991). Moreover, the stay of the adoption proceedings pending the outcome of this appeal has delayed the fulfillment of the case plan and the permanency of the placements of the children. In order to resolve this portion of the litigation so that the paternal grandparents' adoption proceedings may proceed and the children's permanent placement be finally achieved, the Clerk of this Court is directed to issue the mandate in this case forthwith.

IV.

CONCLUSION

For the foregoing reasons, the June 28, 2007, order by the Circuit Court of Mingo County is hereby affirmed as to the portions unrelated to the visitation rights of the maternal grandparents, John T. and Mabel T. Moreover, the June 28, 2007, order by the circuit court is reversed insofar as it awarded unsupervised visitation to the maternal grandparents against the best interests of the children. Finally, we remand this case to the Circuit Court of Mingo County for entry of an order permanently terminating the visitation rights of the maternal grandparents, John and Mabel, consistent with this opinion. The Clerk of this Court is directed to issue the mandate in this case forthwith.

Per Curiam:
In this abuse and neglect case, the Circuit Court of Cabell County denied a motion to reconsider the dismissal of the infant child, Amanda J., from an abuse and neglect proceeding concerning Scott C., an abused child residing in the same home as Amanda J. See footnote 1 On appeal, the guardian ad litem for the infant children maintains that the circuit court erred in refusing to conduct an evidentiary hearing concerning Amanda J. and in failing to conduct a disposition hearing concerning Scott C. Because the circuit court erred in both these matters, we reverse the decision of the circuit court and remand the case for action consistent with this opinion.

I.
Facts and Background

On April 1, 1996, both Scott C. (date of birth, July 22, 1984) and Amanda J. (date of birth, September 29, 1990) were living in the home of Brenda J. and Leslie J., the natural parents of Amanda J. Scott C., who is a cousin of Amanda J., had been living with Brenda J. and Leslie J., his aunt and uncle, since he was an infant. Tina C. is the natural mother of Scott C., and Homer J. is the putative father of Scott C.

On April 1, 1996, Brenda Wright, a Social Service Worker with the West Virginia Department of Health and Human Resources (the "Department") filed a petition in the circuit court alleging that Scott C. had been sexually abused by a male relative who lived about a block away. The petition also alleged the Amanda J., while being examined at the request of the Department, told a nurse that her father, Leslie J., had "done to her what he had done to Scott." Because of the allegations of abuse and neglect, the children were removed from their home and placed in the Department's custody. Lisa F. White, Esq., was appointed guardian ad litem for the children.

After an April 23, 1996 hearing (order entered May 10, 1996), physical custody of the children was returned to Brenda J. and Leslie J., but legal custody remained with the Department. An amended petition was filed by the Department on April 25, 1996 alleging the Brenda J. and Leslie J. failed to protect the children.

On July 1, 1996, after several delays, a probable cause hearing was held. Evidence was presented that Scott C. had been abused by a relative who lived in the neighborhood. A social worker for the Department testified that Brenda J. and Leslie J. were taking action to keep Scott C. away from the alleged abuser. The circuit court was informed that Leslie J. was no longer living with Brenda J. Based on the evidence presented, the abuse case regarding Scott C. against Brenda J. and Leslie J. was dismissed. An adjudicatory hearing regarding the abandonment of Scott C. by his natural parents was set.

Amanda J. was not mentioned in the July 1, 1996 motion for probable cause. By order entered on July 17, 1996, the circuit court found no evidence that Amanda J. was abused or neglected and dismissed the petition concerning Amanda J.

On August 19, 1996, due to the abandonment of Scott C. by his natural parents, the circuit court terminated their parental rights. Brenda J. was given temporary custody of Scott C. "until such time as the West Virginia Department of Health and Human Resources conducts an investigation of this home." At the conclusion of the hearing, the circuit court declined to set a date for a disposition hearing, and the record does not indicate that such a hearing was held. See footnote 2

On October 21, 1996 after the guardian ad litem obtained some new evidence from Amanda J.'s teacher indicating that Amanda J. was having substantial problems at school, the guardian ad litem filed a motion requesting reconsideration of the July 1, 1996 order dismissing Amanda J. from the abuse and neglect petition. See footnote 3 On November 4, 1996, a hearing was held during which the guardian ad litem requested the circuit court hold an evidentiary hearing on the matter so that she could present evidence. Counsel for the Department supported the motion by saying "we think the motion seeks appropriate relief, the motion of the guardian." The motion was opposed by counsel for Brenda J. and Leslie J. When the guardian ad litem requested a transcript of the hearing, the circuit court indicated that the guardian ad litem had to pay for the transcript, which she agreed to do. See footnote 4 By order entered on November 18, 1996, the circuit court denied the guardian ad litem's motion to reconsider.

On appeal, the guardian ad litem maintains that the circuit court erred by: (1) failing to hold an evidentiary hearing to consider evidence supporting her motion to reconsider Amanda J.'s dismissal from the abuse and neglect petition; (2) failing to set a timely disposition hearing on Scott C.; and (3) requiring the guardian ad litem to pay for the hearing transcript.

II.
Discussion
A.
Standard of Review

On appeal, this Court applies a three-pronged standard of review. We review a circuit court's findings of fact under a clearly erroneous standard; questions of law and statutory interpretation are reviewed de novo; and a circuit court's final order and ultimate resolution is reviewed under an abuse of discretion standard. Syllabus

Point 2 of In re Katie S.,supra, note 2 states the standard of review in abuse and neglect cases:

> "Although conclusions of law reached by a circuit court are subject to de novo review, when an action, such as an abuse and neglect case, is tried upon the facts without a jury, the circuit court shall make a determination based upon the evidence and shall make findings of fact and conclusions of law as to whether such child is abused or neglected. These findings shall not be set aside by a reviewing court unless clearly erroneous. A finding is clearly erroneous when, although there is evidence to support the finding, the reviewing court on the entire evidence is left with the definite and firm conviction that a mistake has been committed. However, a reviewing court may not overturn a finding simply because it would have decided the case differently, and it must affirm a finding if the circuit court's account of the evidence is plausible in light of the record viewed in its entirety." Syllabus Point 1, In Interest of Tiffany Marie S., 196 W.Va. 223, 470 S.E.2d 177 (1996).

See Syllabus Point 4, Burgess v. Porterfield, 196 W.Va. 178, 469 S.E.2d 114 (1996) (applying a three-pronged standard of review in civil cases).

Evidence of abuse and neglect must be clear and convincing. W.Va. Code 49-6-2(c) [1996] provides, in pertinent part, that "[t]he findings must be based upon conditions existing at the time of the filing of the petition and proven by clear and convincing proof." See Syllabus Point 3, In re Jeffrey R.L., 190 W.Va. 24, 435 S.E.2d 162 (1993) ("Parental rights may be terminated where there is clear and convincing evidence" in appropriate circumstances).

In applying this blend of deferential-plenary standards of review, this Court's primary goal and focus must be on the health and welfare of the children. Syllabus Point 3 of Katie S. states:

Although parents have substantial rights that must be protected, the primary goal in cases involving abuse and neglect, as in all family law matters, must be the health and welfare of the children.

We begin by considering the circuit court's denial of the guardian ad litem's motion to reconsider the dismissal of Amanda J. without affording the guardian the opportunity to present evidence.

B.

Motion to Reconsider - Amanda J.

The guardian ad litem maintains that the circuit court erred in denying her the opportunity to present evidence in support of her motion to reconsider the dismissal of the abuse and neglect petition concerning Amanda J. Amanda's parents, Brenda J. and Leslie J., maintain that because the findings must be based on conditions existing at the time of the petition, new evidence requires a new petition.

Guardians ad litem must be afforded a meaningful opportunity to represent fully the infant children involved in abuse and neglect cases. This Court has consistently recognized the duties and responsibilities of guardians ad litem and has rejected the imposition of "unreasonable limitations upon the function of guardians ad litem in representing their clients. . . ." In re Christina L., 194 W.Va. 446, 453, 460 S.E.2d 692, 699 (1995). In Syllabus Point 4 of Christina L., we stated:

> "Each child in an abuse and neglect case is entitled to effective representation of counsel. To further that goal, W.Va.Code, 49-6-2(a) [1992] mandates that a child has a right to be represented by counsel in every stage of abuse and neglect proceedings. Furthermore, Rule XIII of the West Virginia Rules for Trial Courts of Record provides that a guardian ad litem shall make a full and independent investigation of the facts involved in the proceeding, and shall make his or her recommendations known to the court. Rules 1.1 and 1.3 of the West Virginia Rules of Professional Conduct, respectively, require an attorney to provide competent representation to a client, and to act with reasonable diligence and promptness in representing a client." Syllabus Point 5, in part, In re Jeffrey R.L., 190 W.Va. 24, 435 S.E.2d 162 (1993)."

The right to the opportunity to be heard is also stated in W.Va. Code, 49-6-2(c) [1996], which provides, in pertinent part:

> In any proceeding pursuant to the provisions of this article, the party or parties having custodial or other parental rights or responsibilities to the child shall be afforded a meaningful opportunity to be heard, including the opportunity to testify and to present and cross-examine witnesses.

In this case, we note that Amanda J. was living in the home with Scott C., a child determined to have been the victim of abuse. In Syllabus Point 2 of Christina L., we indicated that children living in the home with abused children were at substantial risk of abuse. Syllabus Point 2 of Christina L. states:

> Where there is clear and convincing evidence that a child has suffered physical and/or sexual abuse while in the custody of his or her parent(s), guardian, or custodian, another child residing in the home when the abuse took place who is not a direct victim of the physical and/or sexual abuse but is at risk of being abused is an abused child under W.Va.Code, 49-1-3(a) (1994).

Because of the relationship between the children, the circuit court should have been alerted to the possibility that Amanda J. might be abused and should have afforded the child every opportunity to insure her health and safety.

We agree that "findings [of abuse and neglect] must be based upon conditions existing at the time of the filing of the petition and proven by clear and convincing proof." W.Va. Code, 49-6-2(c), in part. But without any hearing of the evidence, any findings that the evidence either did or did not relate to conditions existing at the time of the filing or did or did not provide clear and convincing proof is without any basis. In Syllabus Point 3 of Christina L., we declined to speculate on the kind or type of evidence needed to provide "clear and convincing proof" by stating:

> "'W.Va.Code, 49-6-2(c) [1980], requires the State Department of Welfare [now the Department of Health and Human Resources], in a child abuse or neglect case, to prove "conditions existing at the time of the filing of the petition ... by clear and convincing proof." The statute, however, does not specify any particular manner or mode of testimony or evidence by which the State Department of Welfare is obligated to meet this burden.' Syllabus Point 1, In Interest of S.C., 168 W.Va. 366, 284 S.E.2d 867 (1981). Syllabus Point 1, West Virginia Department of Human Services v. Peggy F., 184 W.Va. 60, 399 S.E.2d 460 (1990). Syllabus Point 1, In re Beth, 192 W.Va. 656, 453 S.E.2d 639 (1994)."

In accord Syllabus Point 1, In re Joseph A., ___ W.Va. ___, ___ S.E.2d ___ (No. 23780 Mar. 26, 1997).

In this case, the circuit court should have afforded Ms. White, the guardian ad litem representing the infant child, "a meaningful opportunity to be heard" as required by W.Va. Code, 49-6-2(c) [1996]. We find that the circuit court erred in denying Ms. White an evidentiary hearing in which she could present the additional evidence she had obtained concerning the infant child and we remand this case with directions to hold such a hearing as soon as possible. In any event, the evidentiary hearing must be held within twenty (20) calender days of the filing date of this opinion.

C.

Disposition Hearing - Scott C.

The guardian ad litem also alleges that the circuit court erred in failing to schedule and hold a disposition hearing concerning Scott C. The circuit court at the August 19, 1996 adjudicatory hearing ordered the Department to perform a home study of Brenda J., the aunt with whom he was living, with the hearing to be set when the home study was completed. At oral argument before this Court, the parties agreed that the home study had not been done and that no disposition hearing has been scheduled for Scott C. See note 2 for the current living arrangement of Scott C.

Counsel for Brenda J. and Leslie J. maintain that this Court should not apply the 60-day standard for setting a disposition hearing found in Rule 32 of the new Rules of Procedure for Child Abuse and Neglect Proceedings, adopted December 5, 1996, effective January 1, 1997. See footnote 5

Although the time limits of Rule 32 were not in effect until after the circuit court's August 19, 1996 decision, we are concerned about the almost ten-month delay in this case. In Syllabus Point 1, in part, In re Carlita B., 185 W.Va. 613, 408 S.E.2d 365 (1991), we recognized that "[u]njustified procedural delays wreak havoc on a child's development, stability and security." In Christina L., 194 W.Va. at 455, 460 S.E.2d at 701, we criticized the delay in considering abandonment because such delay "leaves the status of the children dangling. . . in 'No Man's Land'. . . ." See Katie S., 198 W.Va. at __, 479 S.E.2d at 596.

The need for prompt resolution of abuse and neglect cases was recognized by the Legislature in W. Va. Code, 49-6-2(d) [1996], which provides, in pertinent part:

> Any petition filed and any proceeding held under the provisions of this article shall, to the extent practicable, be given priority over any other civil action before the court, except proceedings under article two-a [48-2A-1 et seq.], chapter forty-eight of this code and actions in which trial is in progress.

Syllabus Point 1, in part, Carlita B. states:

> Child abuse and neglect cases must be recognized as being among the highest priority for the courts' attention. Unjustified procedural delays wreak havoc on a child's development, stability and security.

In accord Syllabus Point 3, In re Jonathan G., ___ W.Va. ___, 482 S.E.2d 893 (1996).

In this case, we find that the circuit court erred in failing to deal promptly with the disposition hearing of Scott C. Although W.Va. Code, 49-6-5 (a)[1996] requires the Department to file a permanency plan for the child, the circuit court needs to set a time frame for final disposition so that the child does not remain indefinitely in "No Man's Land." On remand, the circuit court should set a disposition hearing on Scott C., as soon as possible; in any event, the disposition hearing must be held within twenty (20) calender days of the filing date of this opinion.

Transcripts

The guardian ad litem's final assignment of error concerns the circuit court requirement that she pay for a transcript of the proceedings. In their brief, Counsel for Brenda J. and Leslie J., who are the Chief Public Defender and a Public Defender for Huntington, indicated that "John R. Rogers, Director of the West Virginia Public Defender Services, has confirmed that he interprets West Virginia Code 29-21-13a as requiring him to pay for official transcript costs for abuse and neglect proceedings when they are approved as part of the voucher signed by the presiding judge." This policy is to remain in effect until Senate Bill 335 (W.Va. Code, 51-7-8 (1997)) is effective. Senate Bill 335 provides that such costs shall be paid out of the appropriation of this Court. See footnote 6

We note that W.Va. Code, 49-6-2 (e) [1996] provides for a transcript to be furnished for indigent persons without cost. See footnote 7 Rule 6 of the Manual for Official Court Reporters of the West Virginia Judiciary (Administrative Office of the West Virginia Supreme Court of Appeals), Promulgated October 30, 1984, Amended October 18, 1996 ("Official Court Reporter Manual"), states:

Transcripts of less than 100 pages in length requested by an indigent party for purposes of appealing a determination in a civil child abuse and neglect proceeding will be produced by the court reporter in accordance with the provisions of this Section governing production of transcripts in civil appeals.

The Official Court Reporter Manual also contains an "Transcript Pay Statement/Administrative Order" in Appendix C, which indicates the procedures to be followed for payment.

In this case, the infant children, represented by Ms. White as their guardian ad litem, are indigent persons and a transcript should have been furnished without requiring the guardian ad litem to pay from her own funds. We find that the circuit court erred in requiring the guardian ad litem for the infant indigent children to pay personally for the transcript necessary for this appeal.

For the above-stated reasons, we reverse the decision of the Circuit Court of Cabell County and remand this case for further prompt proceedings consistent with this opinion; said proceedings must be conducted within twenty (20) days of the filing date of this opinion.

Reversed and remanded, with directions.

Footnote: 1 We follow our traditional practice in cases involving sensitive facts by using initials to identify the parties rather than their full names. See Phillip Leon M. v. Greenbrier County Bd. of Educ., ___ W.Va. ___, 484 S.E.2d 909 (1996); In re Katie S., 198 W.Va. 79, 479 S.E.2d 589 (1996).

Footnote: 2 During oral argument, the guardian ad litem and counsel for the Department said that Scott C. is currently in the Cammack Children's Home and that no disposition hearing has been held. Amanda J. remains in the home with her mother Brenda J., but Leslie J. no longer lives in the home.
Although counsel for the Department did not file a brief in this matter, by letter dated May 8, 1997, the Department indicated that during the lower court proceedings, the Department "stated that the guardian's motion sought the appropriate relief."
We note that counsel for the Department appeared at oral argument and was able to respond to several of the concerns of this Court. A written brief by the Department outlining why the Department supported the guardian ad litem's motion would have assisted the Court in understanding the Department's position. We continue to encourage all parties, including the Department, to file briefs in such matters.

Footnote: 3 During oral argument, the guardian ad litem indicated that in addition to the evidence attached to her appeal petition, namely, Amanda J.'s medical report of March 29, 1996 and school materials, including a October 30, 1996 letter from Amanda J.'s teacher, she had additional evidence to present.

Footnote: 4 The following exchange occurred during the November 4, 1996 hearing concerning a transcript of the hearing:
MS. WHITE: Your Honor, at this time can I request that I have a copy of the transcript of this hearing?
THE COURT: Upon proper arrangements.
MS. WHITE: And I'll prepare an order to that effect.
THE COURT: With the reporter. The state supreme court in their wisdom, I believe, have indicated they wouldn't pay for -- is this one of the ones? And, therefore, you will need to find out how to get the good graces of my reporter or you may wish to pay.
MS. WHITE: Your Honor, I would wish to pay and --

THE COURT: And you could get repaid.
MS. WHITE: No, they won't repay me either. But I'll pay that.

Footnote: 5 Rule 32 [1997] of the Rules of Procedure for Child Abuse and Neglect provides, in pertinent part:
(a) Time Frame. -- The disposition hearing shall commence within forty-five (45) days of the entry of the final adjudicatory order unless an improvement period is granted pursuant to W.Va. Code 49-6-12(b) and then no later than sixty (60) days.

Footnote: 6 Senate Bill 335 provides, in pertinent part:
In any proceeding held pursuant to article five or six, chapter forty-nine of this code in which an indigent respondent or his or her counsel has filed a written request, in the manner prescribed by the supreme court of appeals, evidencing an intent to appeal a decision of a circuit court in the proceeding, the court, upon presentation of a written request, presented within thirty days after the entry of the order sought to be appealed, shall authorize and direct the court reporter to furnish a transcript of the testimony of the proceeding or the part or parts thereof that have specifically been requested.
The court, after being sufficiently satisfied by the reasonableness of the voucher or claim submitted for payment of the cost of preparing the transcript, shall certify the cost to the state auditor, who shall, in a timely manner, pay the court reporter's fee from appropriations to the supreme court of appeals.

Footnote: 7 W.Va. Code, 49-6-2(e) [1996] provides, in pertinent part:
The evidence shall be transcribed and made available to the parties or their counsel as soon as practicable, if the same is required for purposes of further proceedings. If an indigent person intends to pursue further proceedings, the court reporter shall furnish a transcript of the hearing without cost to the indigent person if an affidavit is filed stating that he cannot pay therefor.

Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia

In the Matter of SCOTTIE D., Rebecca W., Patsy D., and Crystal D., Children Under the Age of Eighteen Years

Submitted Jan. 9, 1991
Decided June 14, 1991

SYLLABUS BY THE COURT

1. "W. Va. Code, 49-1-3(a) [, as amended], in part, defines an abused child to include one whose parent knowingly allows another person to commit the abuse. Under this standard, termination of parental rights is usually upheld only where the parent takes no action in the face of knowledge of the abuse or actually aids or protects the abusing parent." Syl. pt. 3, In re Betty J.W., 179 W.Va. 605, 371 S.E.2d 326 (1988).

2. Termination of parental rights of a parent of an abused child is authorized under W.Va.Code, 49-6-1 to 49-6-10, as amended, where such parent contends nonparticipation in the acts giving rise to the termination petition but there is clear and convincing evidence that such nonparticipating parent knowingly took no action to prevent or stop such acts to protect the child. Furthermore, termination of parental rights of a parent of an abused child is authorized under W.Va.Code, 49-6-1 to 49-6-10, as amended, where such nonparticipating parent supports the other parent's version as to how a child's injuries occurred, but there is clear and convincing evidence that such version is inconsistent with the medical evidence.

3. In a proceeding to terminate parental rights pursuant to W.Va.Code, 49- 6-1 to 49-6-10, as amended, a guardian ad litem, appointed pursuant to W.Va.Code, 49-6-2(a), as amended, must exercise reasonable diligence in carrying out the responsibility of protecting the rights of the children. This duty includes exercising the appellate rights of the children, if, in the reasonable judgment of the guardian ad litem, an appeal is necessary.

McHUGH, Justice:

This case is before the Court upon the appeal of Peter A. Hendricks, guardian ad litem for Scottie D., Rebecca W., Patsy D., and Crystal D. See footnote 1The appellee is Ronald D. In the action below, the West Virginia Department of Human Services (DHS) petitioned the Circuit Court of Boone County to terminate the parental rights of Ronald D. and his wife, Joyce D., pursuant to W.Va.Code, 49-6-1 [1977]. See footnote 2 In that action, the appellant was appointed guardian ad litem for the infant children. The appellant is aggrieved by the March 17, 1989 order of the circuit court. For reasons stated in this opinion, we reverse that order.

On February 11, 1985, the DHS filed an action in the Circuit Court of Boone County, alleging that the children of the appellee, Ronald D. and his wife, Joyce D., were neglected and abused pursuant to W.Va.Code, 49-1-3 [1990]. See footnote 3

The appellee and Joyce were married on November 24, 1983. Four children are now involved in this case: Scottie D., seven and one-half years old at the time of the petition in this case, the natural son of the appellee, Ronald D., but not of Joyce D.; Rebecca W., three years old, the natural daughter of Joyce D., but not of the appellee; Patsy D., one year old, born of both the appellee and Joyce D.; and Crystal D., born in 1986 of both the appellee and Joyce D. See footnote 4

The DHS petition sought to terminate the parental rights of the appellee and Joyce. Giving rise to this petition was an incident which occurred on February 8, 1985, wherein one of the children, namely, Rebecca, was treated in a hospital emergency room due to severe burns on her feet. See footnote 5

Following trial of the DHS action in the Circuit Court of Boone County, the circuit court entered an order on March 17, 1989, concluding that the appellee, Ronald D., did not neglect or abuse his children (Scottie, Patsy and Crystal) within the meaning of W.Va.Code, 49-1-3 [1984]. The order also concluded, however, that Ronald D. has no parental rights to Rebecca because she had not been adopted by him. See footnote 6

The primary issue raised by the appellant is that the circuit court committed error by returning the children to Ronald D. based upon its finding that there is no evidence of abuse on the part of Ronald D. Rather, the appellant contends that there was clear and convincing evidence that Ronald D. either: (1) took no action with respect to the abuse inflicted upon his children; or (2) actually aided or protected the abusing parent, Joyce, by supporting her version as to how the children were injured.

The medical evidence presented in this case indicated that Rebecca, when she was admitted to the emergency room on February 8, 1985, suffered from: severe submersion burns on both feet, resulting in the loss of several toes; a laceration on one foot; cigarette burns which were secondary to the submersion burns; a laceration on her lip; bruises on her back; and spots on her head where hair had evidently been pulled out. Rebecca was admitted to the hospital the following day.

Dr. Jill Bross, the chief pediatric resident in charge of the case, testified on behalf of the DHS that during physical therapy, Rebecca told her that her parents had injured her in this way.

Dr. Bross testified that, in her opinion, the burns on Rebecca's feet were submersion burns. This opinion is based upon a number of reasons: both feet had second to third degree burns; the pattern of the burns; the burns stopped at a single line of demarcation; there were no splashmarks; the burns extended down in between the toes and all the way around the feet. Dr. Bross testified that Rebecca related to her that the appellee burned her feet with a cigarette and that her mother put her feet in hot water. Rebecca also told Dr. Bross that the appellee pulled her hair out and cut her lip.

Dr. Bross also testified that, in an unofficial capacity, she examined Patsy. This examination revealed bruises in the vaginal area. Dr. Bross testified that such bruises are not of an accidental type because there were no surrounding marks in the leg area.

Scottie testified that he did not want to return to living with his father and Joyce due to the physical abuse that he endured. Scottie testified that his father and Joyce made him and Rebecca eat out of the garbage bin and that they sometimes put Rebecca to sleep on the floor. He also testified that his father and Joyce put shaving cream in Rebecca's mouth because she could not pronounce certain words correctly and also did this when she used bad words. Scottie testified that his father and Joyce taped Rebecca's hands behind her back and made her walk through the hallway under this condition, and that they burned him and Rebecca with cigarettes on numerous occasions. He further testified that his father and Joyce did not make him attend school, and that they put "Nair," a hair removal substance, on his and Rebecca's hair, making their hair fall out.

Scottie also testified that he liked the couple with whom he was currently living, and that he desired to stay with them. He also testified that he currently attends school regularly, is an honor roll student while living with this couple, and is active in extracurricular activities such as scouts and basketball, activities in which his father and Joyce would not allow him to participate. See footnote 7

Rebecca also testified. She was five years old at the time of the hearing in this case. Her testimony was brief and some of it was contradictory. She testified that both parents burned her feet by holding them in a pan of water. However, she also testified that she could not remember who was with her at the time her feet were burned, or even if her mother came to her assistance. See footnote 8 Rebecca also testified that the appellee had burned her foot with a cigarette.

Marjorie Barker, a case worker for the DHS, was involved with this case from its very beginning. One of her responsibilities was to schedule for the children visits with the appellee and Joyce during the period the children were in the temporary legal custody of the DHS. Barker testified that she was usually present during these visits, and that it was evident that the appellee and Joyce did not always exercise the best judgment. See footnote 9

Barker also testified that, in her opinion, it would not be in the children's best interests to be returned to the appellee and Joyce because they would be in danger of injury. Furthermore, Barker testified that it is her opinion that there is very little bonding between the children and their parents.

Joyce D. denied all allegations of abuse and neglect, even though she acknowledged previously pleading guilty in the related criminal proceeding.

Joyce testified that on the night of February 8, 1985, Rebecca told her that she was going out on the front porch in order to urinate. See footnote 10 When Rebecca came back into the house, she told Joyce that she had stepped on an ax and cut her toes, and when Joyce was in the kitchen getting cold water to treat the cut toes, Rebecca stepped into a pan of hot water in the living room, which was to be used for mopping the floor. Joyce testified that she never saw Rebecca standing in the water. Joyce testified that she then went to get her husband, the appellee, from his parents' house next door. She called an ambulance and Rebecca was taken to the hospital.

Joyce testified that Rebecca got into the Nair hair remover herself, mistakenly believing that it was baby lotion. Joyce claimed that Rebecca rubbed the Nair in her own hair. As for Rebecca's cut lip, Joyce claimed that it opened due to being chapped.

When asked about two small circular burns on Rebecca's foot, Joyce testified that a pair of boots had caused the markings. Joyce also testified that neither she nor her husband ever put shaving cream in Rebecca's mouth, and that she never made Rebecca sleep on the floor.

The appellee, Ronald D., testified as well. The appellee's testimony is consistent with Joyce's to the extent that it is supportive of her testimony. In addition to denying the commission of any abusive acts toward the children, the appellee essentially testified that he believed that the injuries to the children occurred in the manner as expressed to him by his wife, Joyce.

Specifically, with respect to the hot water burns on Rebecca's feet, the appellee testified that he was at his parents' house, which is about fifty to seventy-five feet from his own, when Joyce came to tell him of Rebecca's burns. The appellee alleges that his wife told him that Rebecca got into the mop water by herself and that he has never discussed it with her since that time.

The appellee testified that he once asked Joyce how Rebecca's hair came out and was told by Joyce that Rebecca got into the Nair hair remover herself. Furthermore, like Joyce, he testified that Rebecca's cut lip was the result of it being chapped.

As for the cigarette burns, the appellee testified that he had never noticed such burns on Rebecca's hands, but the burns on her feet were the result of wearing a particular pair of boots. This testimony is consistent with Joyce's version. In regard to cigarette burns on Scottie, the appellee testified that Scottie ran into him when he had a cigarette in his hand.

The appellee also testified that Joyce told him about Rebecca cutting her foot on the ax. This occurred after Rebecca was taken to the hospital on the night of February 8, 1985. See footnote 11

II

This Court has recognized the fundamentally protected right of a natural parent to the custody of minor children.

> In the law concerning custody of m inor children, no rule is m ore firm ly established than that the right of a natural parent to the custody of his or her infant child is param ount to that of any other person; it is a fundam ental personal liberty protected and guaranteed by the Due Process Clauses of the West Virginia and United States Constitutions.

Syl. pt. 1, In re Willis, 157 W.Va. 225, 207 S.E.2d 129 (1973).

This principle, however, is tempered, thus, such right is not absolute. "Though constitutionally protected, the right of the natural parent to the custody of minor children is not absolute and it may be limited or terminated by the State, as parens patriae, if the parent is proved unfit to be entrusted with child care." Id., syl. pt. 5.

Under W.Va.Code, 49-6-2 [1984], the standard as to whether a child is abused or neglected is "by clear and convincing proof." Accordingly, our review of the facts before the circuit court in this case is based upon a "clear and convincing" standard.

The appellant, as stated previously, contends that this case contains clear and convincing evidence that the appellee either: (1) took no action with respect to the abuse inflicted upon his children; or (2) actually aided or protected the abusing parent, Joyce, by supporting her version as to how the children were injured.

In In re Darla B., 175 W.Va. 137, 331 S.E.2d 868 (1985), this Court affirmed the trial court's termination of a father's parental rights as proper, despite his contention that he was not a direct participant in the acts giving rise to the termination petition, but where he supported his wife's testimony as to physical injuries, which testimony was inconsistent with medical evidence. In Darla B., we noted:

> The father asserts that he should not have his rights terminated because he was not a direct participant in the acts giving rise to the petition [for termination of parental rights]. However, in light of the circumstances of this case, termination of the rights of both parents is the proper result. We note that appellant Dwayne B. supports the testimony of his wife entirely, even though the explanation is inconsistent with the medical evidence. Further, he testified that he was in attendance when the first injury to Darla B. occurred, which involved the child's right frontal lobe. Importantly, the explanation given for this injury by both appellants is inconsistent with the medical evidence. Aside from his direct support of his wife's version of the reasons for the infant's injuries, it is ludicrous for him to assert that he should be held blameless for his nonaction in protecting his child.

The appellee maintains that the Darla B. case is distinguishable because in that case, both parents were present at the time of one of the child's injuries and it was obvious that they were both lying to protect each other. In this case, the appellee contends that because he was not present at the time of the injury (referring to Rebecca's hot water burns), then the purpose of his testimony was not to protect his wife.

However, this distinction is inapposite and somewhat inaccurate. As we said in Darla B. and quoted herein, "it is ludicrous for [the nonparticipating father] to assert that he should be held blameless for his nonaction in protecting his child." Darla B., 175 W.Va. at 141, 331 S.E.2d at 873 (emphasis supplied). Although the appellee's version does not expressly support his wife's account, it is nonetheless supportive, and, importantly, inconsistent with the medical evidence presented. This is especially apparent from the appellee's testimony that he never discussed Rebecca's burns with Joyce after Joyce explained how such burns occurred. Obviously, the appellee believed his wife's version, and, therefore, he is supportive of this version.

Furthermore, the injury to Rebecca's foot was not the only critical event in this case. On the contrary, the record is replete with instances of injuries suffered by the children, some caused not only by the appellee's inaction, but his actions as well.

As pointed out in note 3 supra, W.Va.Code, 49-1-3(a)(1) [1990] provides the definition of an "abused child":

> (a) 'Abused child' means a child whose health or welfare is harmed or threatened by:

> (1) A parent, guardian or custodian who knowingly or intentionally inflicts, attempts to inflict, or knowingly allows another person to inflict, physical injury, or substantial mental or emotional injury, upon the child or another child in the home[.]

We spoke to this statutory provision in syllabus point 3 of In re Betty J.W., 179 W.Va. 605, 371 S.E.2d 326 (1988):

> W.Va.Code, 49-1-3(a) [, as amended], in part, defines an abused child to include one whose parent knowingly allows another person to commit the abuse. Under this standard, termination of parental rights is usually upheld only where the parent takes no action in the face of knowledge of the abuse or actually aids or protects the abusing parent.

Clearly, the appellee's actions and inaction come within this standard, and the evidence presented below was clear and convincing to support this standard.

Therefore, we reiterate our holding in Darla B., 175 W.Va. 137, 331 S.E.2d 868 (1985). Termination of parental rights of a parent of an abused child is authorized under W.Va.Code, 49-6-1 to 49-6-10, as amended, where such parent contends nonparticipation in the acts giving rise to the termination petition but there is clear and convincing evidence that such nonparticipating parent knowingly took no action to prevent or stop such acts to protect the child. Furthermore, termination of parental rights of a parent of an abused child is authorized under W.Va.Code, 49-6-1 to 49-6-10, as amended, where such nonparticipating parent supports the other parent's version as to how a child's injuries occurred, but there is clear and convincing evidence that such version is inconsistent with the medical evidence.

Based upon the experiences through which the children in this case suffered, we fail to see how the circuit court reached the conclusion that the appellee's children are not abused within the meaning of W.Va.Code, 49-1-3, as amended, insofar as their father is concerned.

Accordingly, we reverse the March 17, 1989 order of the Circuit Court of Boone County as it applies to the appellee in this case, Ronald D.

III

The appellant also contends that the circuit court erroneously limited the role of the guardian ad litem for the children in this case.

W.Va.Code, 49-6-2(a) [1984] provides, in part:

> (a) In any proceeding under the provisi ons of this article, the child, his parents, his custodian or other persons standing in loco parentis to him , such persons other than the child being hereinafter referred to as other party or parties, shall have the right to be represented by counsel at every stage of the proceedings and shall be informed by the court of their right to be so represented and that if they cannot pa y for the services of counsel, that counsel will be appointed.

Rule XIII of the West Virginia Trial Court Rules for Trial Courts of Record provides:

> In any proceeding in which a guardian ad litem is appointed, such guardian ad litem shall be selected independently of any nomination by the parties or counsel.
> Any guardian ad litem shall make a fu ll and independent investigation of the facts involved in the proceeding; and either by his testim ony made of record, or by full and complete answer therein, make known to the court his recommendations, concerning the action sought in the proceedings unless otherwise ordered or instructed by the court. Such guardian ad litem shall be paid such com pensation as m ay be allowed by the court, which compensation shall be taxed as part of the costs.

Specifically, the appellant contends that he, as the guardian ad litem, was denied latitude in cross-examining witnesses, presenting evidence, and arguing before the trial court.

Based upon our review of the record, we believe that the guardian ad litem in this case was allowed to effectively represent the children.

However, we believe it appropriate to clarify the role of the guardian ad litem in similar cases.

Under W.Va.Code, 49-6-1 [1977], the DHS is authorized to petition a circuit court for relief on behalf of children that are believed to be neglected or abused. The record in this case, as we have pointed out, overwhelmingly supports termination of parental rights. The fact that the DHS did not pursue an appeal in this case is troublesome to this Court. See footnote 12

Fortunately for the children, though, their guardian ad litem did pursue an appeal, thus, seeking review of the circuit court's erroneous order. The guardian ad litem is to be commended for his diligence in protecting the rights of the children in this case.

In a comparable context, the "guardian ad litem representing an infant plaintiff has full power to act for the purpose of securing the infant's rights, and may do all things that are necessary to this end." 42 Am.Jur.2d Infants § 178, at 165 (1969). Securing the infant's rights includes taking an assertive role and, if in the judgment of the guardian ad litem, a case so warrants, prosecuting an appeal.

It is well established that "[a]fter judgment adverse to his ward, the guardian ad litem has the right to appeal and the duty to do so if it reasonably appears to be to the advantage of the minor[.]" Robinson v. Gatch, 85 Ohio App. 484, 487, 87 N.E.2d 904, 906 (1949). This is based upon the principle that a guardian ad litem has a duty to represent the child(ren) to whom he or she has been appointed, as effectively as if the guardian ad litem were in a normal lawyer-client relationship.

Similarly, the Supreme Court of Wisconsin has held that a "guardian ad litem has the right--if not the duty--to appeal from an adverse decision of a court if he believed the appeal meritorious and necessary for the protection of the children[.]" In re Estate of Trotalli, 123 Wis.2d 340, 349, 366 N.W.2d 879, 883 (1985). See also In re Ross, 29 Ill.App.3d 157, 161-62, 329 N.E.2d 333, 336-37 (1975); State ex rel. Kassen v. Carver, 355 S.W.2d 324, 332-33 (Mo.Ct.App.1962); Carton v. Borden, 8 N.J. 352, 357, 85 A.2d 257, 259 (1951).

The Rules of Professional Conduct recognize the guardian ad litem 's duty to appeal as well. Specifically, Rule 1.14(a) provides: "When a client's ability to make adequately considered decisions in connection with the representation is impaired, whether because of minority, mental disability or for some other reason, the lawyer shall, as far as reasonably possible, maintain a normal client-lawyer relationship with the client." (emphasis supplied). Obviously, a "normal" client-lawyer relationship entails prosecuting an appeal if necessary. Furthermore, Rule 1.3 provides that "[a] lawyer shall act with reasonable diligence and promptness in representing a client."

Accordingly, we hold that in a proceeding to terminate parental rights pursuant to W.Va.Code, 49-6-1 to 49-6-10, as amended, a guardian ad litem, appointed pursuant to W.Va.Code, 49-6-2(a), as amended, must exercise reasonable diligence in carrying out the responsibility of protecting the rights of the children. This duty includes exercising the appellate rights of the children, if, in the reasonable judgment of the guardian ad litem, an appeal is necessary.

Based upon the foregoing, the March 17, 1989 order of the Circuit Court of Boone County is reversed. See footnote 13

Footnote: 2 The Department of Human Services is now known as the "division of human services," and is now a part of the "department of health and human resources." See W.Va.Code, 5F-2-1(d)(2) [1990]; W.Va.Code, 5F-2-1(j) [1990]; and W.Va.Code, 9-2-1a [1985].

Footnote: 3 W.Va.Code, 49-1-3 was amended in 1990. The 1984 version of this provision was in effect at the time this action was commenced. However, the amendments have no bearing on the pertinent part of W.Va.Code, 49-1-3, which provides:
(a) 'Abused child' means a child whose health or welfare is harmed or threatened by:
(1) A parent, guardian or custodian who knowingly or intentionally inflicts, attempts to inflict, or knowingly allows another person to inflict, physical injury, or substantial mental or emotional injury, upon the child or another child in the home [.]
(emphasis supplied)

Footnote: 4 Upon Crystal D.'s birth, the other three children had already been removed from their home by the DHS, and, consistent with this action, she too was placed in the temporary legal custody of the DHS.
Ronald D. did not adopt as his child, Rebecca W., nor did Joyce D. adopt as her child, Scottie D.

Footnote: 5 Subsequent to the filing of the DHS petition, criminal proceedings were instituted against the appellee and Joyce D. Both were indicted by a grand jury in Boone County and charged with malicious wounding and child abuse.
Joyce D. pled guilty and was sentenced to prison for one to three years.
Ronald D. was tried on the indictment and the case was dismissed, on the prosecutor's motion, due to contradictory testimony as well as a lack of critical testimony on the part of a key witness, namely, Rebecca W.

Footnote: 6 The appellee and Joyce D. were divorced on June 1, 1988.

Footnote: 7 Slight variations in the testimony were revealed when Scottie took the stand. During cross-examination, Scottie testified that around the time that the children were removed from the home, when he was only six years old, he was not completely truthful with the deputy sheriff who was investigating the situation. Specifically, the untruthful statements concerned: whether Rebecca slept on the floor at all times; whether Scottie liked attending school, and, hence, whether he was angry with his father for not making him attend; and whether he loved his father. However, Scottie, who was nine years old at the time of the hearing in court, testified that when he spoke with the deputy sheriff, he was only attempting to protect his father. When asked what he meant by protecting his father, Scottie replied: "I didn't want him to go to jail, but now I am telling the truth."

Footnote: 8 Rebecca was only three years old at the time her feet were burned in the water.

Footnote: 9 For example, Barker testified that on one occasion, the appellee told Scottie that he (the appellee) sold Scottie's dog. This upset Scottie to a point where he almost cried, until his father told him that he was only joking.

Footnote: 10 Joyce testified that their house did not have running water.

Footnote: 11 Furthermore, the record in this case contains the findings and report of Dr. LaRee Naviaux, a licensed clinical psychologist, social worker, and counsellor.
Dr. Naviaux examined the children from August, 1989, to May, 1990. These examinations were very thorough, and included, among other things, depression tests, personality questionnaires, history and background evaluations, and intelligence tests. Based upon the evidence, Dr. Naviaux found that the behaviors of the children are consistent with neglect and abuse. Dr. Naviaux's recommendation is as follows: There appears to be no basic relationship which could be developed into an appropriate parent-child relationship with love and trust. Thus, it is not in the best interests of these children as individuals or as a family unit to be returned to the custody of their father. Considerable trauma would be added to the life of each child. Regression, emotional problems, and deterioration of behavior, with acting-out would likely occur. Self-esteem would diminish and a zest for life would disappear. Living would become surviving.
They are already children at risk for what they have experienced thus far in their lives and with their inherited abilities and characteristics. A return to their father would increase the at risk status.

Footnote: 12 W.Va.Code, 49-7-22 [1936] provides: "Cases under this chapter, if tried in any inferior court, may be reviewed by writ of error or appeal to the circuit court, and if tried or reviewed in a circuit court, by writ of error or appeal to the supreme court of appeals."

Footnote: 13 The March 17, 1989 order of the Circuit Court of Boone County is not reversed as it applies to Joyce D. Joyce D. is not an appellee herein inasmuch as no appearance was made on her behalf.
The appellant also assigns other errors, which, in light of our holding, we need not address. These other errors include: the circuit court's failure to address the question of whether the appellee, Ronald D., could benefit from counselling; and the circuit court's failure to consider the passage of four years since the children lived with the appellee.

SYLLABUS BY THE COURT

1. "In reviewing challenges to the findings and conclusions of the circuit court, we apply a two-prong deferential standard of review. We review the final order and the ultimate disposition under an abuse of discretion standard, and we review the circuit court's underlying factual findings under a clearly erroneous standard. Questions of law are subject to a de novo review." Syllabus Point 2, Walker v. West Virginia Ethics Com'n, 201 W.Va. 108, 492 S.E.2d 167 (1997).

2. "In . . . custody matters, we have traditionally held paramount the best interests of the child." Syllabus Point 5, in part, Carter v. Carter, 196 W.Va. 239, 470 S.E.2d 193 (1996).

3. "In cases where there is a termination of parental rights, the circuit court should consider whether continued association with siblings in other placements is in the child's best interests, and if such continued association is in such child's best interests, the court should enter an appropriate order to preserve the rights of siblings to continued contact." Syllabus Point 4, James M. v. Maynard, 185 W.Va. 648, 408 S.E.2d 400 (1991).

4. W.Va. Code § 49-2-14(e) (1995) provides for a "sibling preference" wherein the West Virginia Department of Health and Human Resources is to place a child who is in the department's custody with the foster or adoptive parent(s) of the child's sibling or siblings, where the foster or adoptive parents seek the care and custody of the child, and the department determines (1) the fitness of the persons seeking to enter into a foster care or adoption arrangement which would unite or reunite the siblings, and (2) placement of the child with his or her siblings is in the best interests of the children. In any proceeding brought by the department to maintain separation of siblings, such separation may be ordered only if the circuit court determines that clear and convincing evidence supports the department's determination. Upon review by the circuit court of the department's determination to unite a child with his or her siblings, such determination shall be disregarded only where the circuit court finds, by clear and convincing evidence, that the persons with whom the department seeks to place the child are unfit or that placement of the child with his or her siblings is not in the best interests of one or all of the children.

5. "Questions relating to . . . custody of the children are within the sound discretion of the court and its action with respect to such matters will not be disturbed on appeal unless it clearly appears that such discretion has been abused." Syllabus, Nichols v. Nichols, 160 W.Va. 514, 236 S.E.2d 36 (1977).

Maynard, Justice:

This is a disputed adoption case. The Circuit Court of Nicholas County awarded the infant, Shanee Carol B.,[1] to her paternal aunt and uncle, Ralph and Patricia B., the appellees. The infant's maternal aunt and uncle, Richard and Valerie A., now appeal this ruling. For the reasons stated below, we reverse.

I.

FACTS

In September, 2000, Eric and Krissa B., the biological parents of Shanee Carol B. ("Shanee"), born on July 16, 1998, relinquished their parental rights to Shanee after a finding of neglect. Subsequently, Ralph and Patricia B. ("the Bs"), the paternal aunt and uncle of Shanee, appellees herein, sought to adopt her. The appellants, Richard and Valerie A. ("the As"), Shanee's maternal aunt and uncle, also sought to adopt her. Previously, Richard and Valerie A. adopted Shanee's siblings, Eric, born on January 1, 1996, and Shaquilla, born on January 23, 1993, after the children's biological parents relinquished their parental rights to these children. Shanee has been living with Richard and Valerie A. since May 2000, when she was temporarily placed there by the West Virginia Department of Health and Human

[1]Consistent with our practice in cases involving sensitive matters and children, we use Shanee's last name initial as well as the last name initial of her biological parents and maternal and paternal aunts and uncles.

Resources ("DHHR").

The Circuit Court of Nicholas County held several hearings to determine the ultimate placement of Shanee. During one of these hearings, Shanee's Child Protective Services Worker from the DHHR testified that Shanee should be placed with Richard and Valerie A. This recommendation was based in large part on the "sibling preference" found in W.Va. Code § 49-2-14(e), and on the psychological profiles of the prospective parents. The guardian ad litem recommended that Shanee be placed with Ralph and Patricia B. Admitted into evidence were the psychological profiles performed by Stephen L. O'Keefe, Ph.D., and his letter to the judge in which he recommended shared parenting between the parties. Also, Dr. O'Keefe, who performed the psychological profiles on both sets of prospective parents, testified that, although both couples are appropriate for the placement of Shanee, he recommended Mr. and Mrs. B.[2]

By order of November 21, 2000, the circuit court found that it is in the best interests of Shanee to be placed with Ralph and Patricia B., and that visitation of one weekend a month be continued

[2] Dr. O'Keefe explained that the As' advantage is that they have already adopted Shanee's siblings. The disadvantage is that Eric, Shanee's brother, is very active and difficult to manage, so that having both Eric and Shanee may be quite difficult for Mr. and Mrs. A. The advantage of placing her with Ralph and Patricia B. is that she would be the only child in the home. The disadvantage is that Mr. B. had been the main source of support of Shanee's biological parents, who lived on the same property, so that Shanee's placement with Mr. and Mrs. B. may be compromised by contact with her biological parents. (Shanee's biological parents no longer live on the same property.) When pressed to choose between the prospective parents, Dr. O'Keefe concluded that "[t]he value of having [Shanee] in a home that does not demand the competition that's there with another sibling who is as close and is as demanding as [Eric] is, I think tips the balance towards placing [Shanee] in the [Bs'] home. That's in direct contrast to a value that says children ought to stay together, and I realize that."

with Richard and Valerie A. for six months. The circuit court made the following findings of fact and conclusions of law.

> 1. The Court has considered the preference for sibling placement contained in West Virginia Code §49-2-14 and find [sic] the presumption of placement is rebutted due to the following:
> a. The infant, Shanee Carol [B.], was born to the natural parents after the rights to any siblings had been terminated and said siblings had been adopted.
> b. No sibling bond was ever formed between the infant . . . and her siblings and therefore no siblings [sic] relationship actually exists, also there were occasional visits on holidays.
> c. The Court originally place[d] the infant . . . in the temporary care of the [sic] Ralph and Patricia [B.], and was asked to move the child to the [As] by the [DHHR] as they felt placement with the siblings was mandatory. At the time the infant . . . was moved, the Court stated that it would not consider the move when deciding final placement.
> d. The relationship between Ralph [B.] and Patricia [B.] on the one hand and the infant . . . were [sic] formed while the child was still quite young and before the removal of the infant . . . as Ralph [B.] and Patricia [B.] babysat for the infant . . . , fed her and bathed her.
> 2. Placement of the infant . . . with Ralph [B.] and Patricia [B.] would be in the best interest of the infant . . . for the following reasons:
> a. Ralph [B.] and Patricia [B.] are the natural uncle and aunt of the infant, Shanee Carol [B.], and were frequent caretakers of the child and provided financial and support services to said infant . . . before her removal from the home of the biological parents.
> b. After an investigation the Guardian-Ad-Litem recommended that placement with [the Bs] would be in the best interests of the infant[.]
> c. A psychological evaluation of Dr. Stephen O'Keefe found that either of the homes would be beneficial to the child but that placement with [the Bs] was in the best interest of the infant[.]
> d. The [DHHR's] recommendation of placement with [the As] was because they felt they were bound by West Virginia Code §49-2-14.

> e. Even though both fathers had psychological issues with placing the child in the home according to Dr. O'Keefe, the scales in that regard tilt in favor of placement with [the Bs].
> f. Even though both prospective fathers had criminal records that would be considered minor and would not interfere with either's ability to be an appropriate parent.
> g. The infant, Shanee Carol [B.], had bonded with both [the Bs] and [the As].
> h. Dr. Stephen L. O'Keefe, a psychologist who conducted a psychological evaluation on all of the relevant parties, recommended placement of the infant . . . with Ralph [B.]and Patricia [B.].
> i. [The Bs] do not have a child in their home.
> j. Based upon the testimony of Dr. O'Keefe, the two (2) siblings are [sic] in the home of [the As], are very demanding siblings.
> 3. The Court does conclude by finding that the placement of the child with [the Bs] in which the infant . . . is the only child in the home, would allow the infant . . . to have greater security, attention and resources, and further, that Dr. O'Keefe found that placement with the infant's . . . siblings may not be in the best interest of any of the children due to the extra stress that would be placed on the parents.

The circuit court stayed the execution of the order for seven days in order to allow Richard and Valerie A. to file an appeal. This Court subsequently granted the petition for appeal and stayed the execution of the circuit court's order pending resolution of the appeal.

II.

STANDARD OF REVIEW

Prior to discussing the issues raised by the parties, we set forth the applicable standards of review.

> In reviewing challenges to the findings and conclusions of the circuit court, we apply a two-prong deferential standard of review. We review the final order and the ultimate disposition under an abuse of discretion standard, and we review the circuit court's underlying factual findings under a clearly erroneous standard. Questions of law are subject to a de novo review.

Syllabus Point 2, Walker v. West Virginia Ethics Com'n, 201 W.Va. 108, 492 S.E.2d 167 (1997). Also, "[w]e review the circuit court's application of the law to undisputed facts de novo." In Re Petrey, 206 W.Va. 489, 490, 525 S.E.2d 680, 681 (1999). *See also Lee v. III.

DISCUSSION

Richard and Valerie A. and the DHHR aver that the circuit court erred in failing to adhere to the strong sibling preference mandated by West Virginia statute and case law. They argue that our law prefers that Shanee remain with her two siblings absent clear and convincing evidence to the contrary.

Ralph and Patricia B. and the guardian ad litem respond that the sibling preference expressed in W.Va. Code § 49-2-14 is rebutted by the evidence. First, they note that Shanee never developed a close bond with her siblings because they were removed from the household prior to her birth, and there is no evidence that Shanee even knew her siblings prior to being placed with Richard and Valerie A. in May 2000. Second, W.Va. Code § 49-2-14(e) provides for the separation of siblings if harm would result to one or more of the siblings by joining them, and if reunification would not be in their best interests. The guardian ad litem claims that both of these circumstances are present here as shown by Dr. O'Keefe's testimony that Eric, Shanee's brother, is "hyper"[3] and demanding, and that his competition with his sister Shaquilla is "unusual" and "extreme." The guardian ad litem concludes that the needs of both Shanee and Eric would be compromised by competition for attention in the A. household. Finally, the guardian ad litem points to Dr. O'Keefe's finding that Richard A. is emotionally detached from the children and his wife and dissatisfied with life in general as evidence that Shanee should not be placed with Richard and Valerie A.

This case is governed by W.Va. Code § 49-2-14(e) (1995)[4] which states:

> (e) When a child is in a foster care arrangement and is residing separately from a sibling or siblings who are in another foster home or who have been adopted by another family and the parents with whom the placed or adopted sibling or siblings reside have made application to the department to establish an intent to adopt or to enter into a foster care arrangement regarding a child so that said child may be united or reunited with a sibling or

[3]Dr. O'Keefe clarified that he was not diagnosing Eric as having Attention Deficit Hyperactivity Disorder.

[4]During oral argument before this Court, there was some discussion regarding the applicability of W.Va. Code § 49-2-14(f) to this case. This code section concerns circumstances where two or more siblings have been placed in separate foster care arrangements and the foster parents of the siblings have applied to enter a foster care arrangement with the sibling or siblings not in their home, or where two or more adoptive parents seek to adopt a sibling or siblings of a child they have previously adopted. In such instances, placement is based solely on the best interests of the siblings. In the instant case, however, both of Shanee's siblings are in one adoptive arrangement, and the issue is whether Shanee should be united with them. Therefore, W.Va. Code § 49-2-14(e) is the more applicable code section.

> siblings, the state department shall upon a determination of the fitness of the persons and household seeking to enter into a foster care arrangement or seek an adoption which would unite or reunite siblings, and if termination and new placement are in the best interests of the children, terminate the foster care arrangement and place the child in the household with the sibling or siblings: Provided, That if the department is of the opinion based upon available evidence that residing in the same home would have a harmful physical, mental or psychological effect on one or more of the sibling children or if the child has a physical or mental disability which the existing foster home can better accommodate, or if the department can document that the reunification of the siblings would not be in the best interest of one or all of the children, the state department may petition the circuit court for an order allowing the separation of the siblings to continue: Provided, however, That if the child is twelve years of age or older, the state department shall provide the child the option of remaining in the existing foster care arrangement if remaining is in the best interests of the child. In any proceeding brought by the department to maintain separation of siblings, such separation may be ordered only if the court determines that clear and convincing evidence supports the department's determination. In any proceeding brought by the department seeking to maintain separation of siblings, notice shall be afforded, in addition to any other persons required by any provision of this code to receive notice, to the persons seeking to adopt a sibling or siblings of a previously placed or adopted child and said persons may be parties to any such action.

The parties agree that this code section expresses a preference that siblings be placed in the same household. As noted above, however, Richard and Valerie A. aver that the circuit court improperly disregarded the "sibling preference," and Ralph and Patricia B. assert that the "sibling preference" is rebutted by the evidence.

West Virginia has a "public policy of attempting to unite siblings in foster care placements."

State ex rel. Paul B. v. Hill, 201 W.Va. 248, 257, 496 S.E.2d 198, 207 (1997). See also In Re Michael Ray T., 206 W.Va. 434, 439 n. 15, 525 S.E.2d 315, 320 n. 15 (1999). This Court has held:

> In cases where there is a termination of parental rights, the circuit court should consider whether continued association with siblings in other placements is in the child's best interests, and if such continued association is in such child's best interests, the court should enter an appropriate order to preserve the rights of siblings to continued contact.

Syllabus Point 4, James M. v. Maynard, 185 W.Va. 648, 408 S.E.2d 400 (1991). In James M., 185 W.Va. at 658, 408 S.E.2d at 410, we recognized that "sibling relationships often become more meaningful for brothers and sisters when they are permanently separated from their mothers and fathers[.]"

Other courts also have articulated a preference for keeping siblings together in various contexts. In Eschbach v. Eschbach, 56 N.Y.2d 167, 173, 451 N.Y.S.2d 658, 662, 436 N.E.2d 1260, 1264 (1982), the Court of Appeals of New York explained:

> [I]t is often in the child's best interests to continue to live with his siblings. . . . "Close familial relationships are much to be encouraged." (Matter of Ebert v. Ebert, supra, at p. 704, 382 N.Y.S.2d 472, 346 N.E.2d 240.) "Young brothers and sisters need each other's strengths and association in their everyday and often common experiences, and to separate them, unnecessarily, is likely to be traumatic and harmful." (Obey v. Degling, supra, at p. 771, 375 N.Y.S.2d 91, 337 N.E.2d 601; Matter of Gunderud v. Gunderud, 75 A.D.2d 691, 427 N.Y.S.2d 92; Bistany v. Bistany, supra.)

Likewise, the Court of Appeals of Louisiana opined in Theriot v. Huval, 413 So.2d 337, 341 (1982):

> The separation of children of a family, though sometimes necessary, is a custodial disposition that courts seek to avoid. Normally, the welfare of these children is best served by leaving > them together, so they can have the full benefit of companionship and affection. When feasible, a court should shape it orders to maintain family solidarity. (Quoting Tiffee v. Tiffee, 254 La. 381, 223 So.2d 840 (La. 1969)).

See also, In Re Marriage of Smiley, 518 N.W.2d 376, 380 (Iowa 1994) ("Siblings should not be separated from one another without good and compelling reasons"); Cochenour v. Cochenour, 642 S.W.2d 402, 404 (Mo.Ct.App. 1982) ("Absent exceptional circumstances, the children of divorced parents should not be separated"); In the Matter of the Marriage of Scott, 31 Or.App. 975, 571 P.2d 1281 (1977); Bake v. Bake, 772 P.2d 461 (Utah Ct.App. 1989); Price v. Price, 611 N.W.2d 425 (S.D. 2000); and In the Interest of Pena, 999 S.W.2d 521 (Tex.App. 1999).

Further, it is axiomatic in this Court that "[i]n . . . custody matters, we have traditionally held paramount the best interests of the child." Syllabus Point 5, in part, Carter v. Carter, 196 W.Va. 239, 470 S.E.2d 193 (1996). On numerous occasions we have said that "the best interests of the child is the polar star by which decisions must be made which affect children." Michael K.T. v. Tina L.T., 182 W.Va. 399, 405, 387 S.E.2d 866, 872 (1989) (citation omitted). During oral argument, Mr. and Mrs. A. asserted that W.Va. Code § 49-2-14(e) subordinates the best interests of the child consideration to the sibling preference. Mr. and Mrs. B. countered that the best interests of the child consideration remains paramount in cases such as the instant one, and that the sibling preference is a secondary consideration. We believe that both sibling preference and best interests of the child considerations are incorporated in W.Va. Code § 49-2-14(e). In order to determine how these considerations interact, we look to the clear provisions of the statute.

W.Va. Code § 49-2-14(e) provides that the DHHR is the entity charged with deciding whether to place a child in the same household of his or her siblings. Further, the DHHR is to place the child with his or her siblings if it determines that the persons with whom the child's siblings reside are fit and that placement with the child's siblings is in the best interests of all of the children. The statute lists three instances in which the DHHR may seek the separation of the siblings. These are if the DHHR determines that residing in the same home would have a harmful physical, mental or psychological effect on one or more of the sibling children; if the child being placed has a physical or mental disability which the child's existing placement can better accommodate; or if the DHHR can document that the siblings' reunification would not be in the best interests of one or all of the children. Significantly, the code section provides that in instances where the DHHR seeks the siblings' separation, "such separation may be ordered only if the court determines that clear and convincing evidence supports the [DHHR's] determination." W.Va. Code § 49-2-14(e).

In the instant case, the DHHR did not determine that Shanee should be separated from her siblings but rather that she should be united with them. The standard to be used by the circuit court in reviewing the DHHR's determination that siblings should be united, instead of separated, is not specifically provided for in W.Va. Code § 49-2-14(e). However, because the statute provides that the circuit court is not to order separation, when recommended by the DHHR, in the absence of clear and convincing evidence supporting the DHHR's determination, we believe that it follows that the circuit court is not to disregard the DHHR's recommendation that siblings should be united, unless it finds that clear and convincing evidence indicates to the contrary.

Therefore, we hold that W.Va. Code § 49-2-14(e) (1995) provides for a "sibling preference" wherein the West Virginia Department of Health and Human Resources is to place a child, who is in the department's custody, with the foster or adoptive parent(s) of the child's sibling or siblings, where the foster or adoptive parents seek the care and custody of the child, and the department determines (1) the fitness of the persons seeking to enter into a foster care or adoption arrangement which would unite or reunite the siblings, and (2) placement of the child with his or her siblings is in the best interests of the children. In any proceeding brought by the department to maintain separation of siblings, such separation may be ordered only if the circuit court determines that clear and convincing evidence supports the department's determination. Upon review by the circuit court of the department's determination to unite a child with his or her siblings, such determination shall be disregarded only where the circuit court finds, by clear and convincing evidence, that the persons with whom the department seeks to place the child are unfit or that placement of the child with his or her siblings is not in the best interests of one or all of the children. We now review the circuit court's decision in light of this standard.

Initially, we note that Ralph and Patricia B. and the guardian ad litem essentially challenge the relevance of the sibling preference under the instant facts because, until Shanee was temporarily placed with Richard and Valerie A. by the circuit court, Shanee apparently had little contact with her siblings and had not bonded with them. We do not believe, however, that this fact negates the sibling preference. Shanee and her siblings are still quite young in age so that, given the opportunity, Shanee can still bond with her siblings, come to appreciate their companionship, and ultimately enjoy all of the advantages in life afforded by growing up with brothers and sisters. This Court should not disregard the fact that Shanee has siblings merely because, up to this point in her young life, she unfortunately has not had ample opportunity to enjoy their association. Accordingly, we believe it is proper to apply the sibling preference in our consideration of this case.

By all accounts both sets of prospective adoptive parents in this case would be suitable parents for Shanee. Dr. O'Keefe, in whose assessment the circuit court placed great weight, found both households "to meet all of the standards of adequacy." He determined, however, that the balance tipped toward Ralph and Patricia B. due to the fact that Shanee's siblings, who live with Richard and Valerie A., are extremely active and demanding children. Dr. O'Keefe concluded that Shanee would be better off in the B. household where she would be the only child and would not have to compete with her siblings for attention. Dr. O'Keefe realized, however, that his assessment is "in direct contrast to a value that says children ought to stay together[.]" The circuit court essentially hinged its decision to disregard the recommendation of the DHHR and the sibling preference on Dr. O'Keefe's opinion, and found that, > the placement of the child with [the Bs] in which the infant, Shanee Carol [B.], is the only child in the home, would allow the infant, Shanee Carol [B.], to have greater security, attention and resources, and further, that Dr. O'Keefe found that placement with the infant's . . . siblings may not be in the best interest of any of the children due to the extra stress that would be placed on the parents.

Ordinarily, "[q]uestions relating to . . . custody of the children are within the sound discretion of the court and its action with respect to such matters will not be disturbed on appeal unless it clearly appears that such discretion has been abused." Syllabus, Nichols v. Nichols, 160 W.Va. 514, 236 S.E.2d 36 (1977). In the instant case, however, the circuit court is bound to apply the legal standard set forth in W.Va. Code § 49-2-14(e) to the facts of the case in order to determine whether there is clear and convincing evidence to rebut the sibling preference. Because this matter concerns the circuit court's application of the law to undisputed facts, we will review the circuit court's decision de novo. See In Re Petrey, supra. In other words, we look at the evidence as if for the first time.

According to W.Va. Code § 49-2-14(e), the DHHR's recommendation that Shanee be placed with Mr. and Mrs. A. is not to be disregarded absent clear and convincing evidence to the contrary. "Clear . . . and convincing proof . . . is the highest possible standard of civil proof defined as 'that measure or degree of proof which will produce in the mind of the trier of facts a firm belief or conviction as to the allegations sought to be established.'" Wheeling Dollar Savings & Trust v. Singer, 162 W.Va. 502, 510, 250 S.E.2d 369, 374 (1978) (quoting Cross v. Ledford, 161 Ohio St. 469, 477, 120 N.E.2d 118, 123 (1954) (citation omitted). We are simply not persuaded that clear and convincing evidence supports the conclusion that it is in Shanee's best interests to be separated from her siblings.

The evidence indicates that Richard and Valerie A. have been good parents to Shanee's siblings. According to the findings of fact of the circuit court, based on Dr. O'Keefe's psychological evaluations, "either of the homes would be beneficial to the child[.]" The circuit court found further that Shanee had bonded with both Ralph and Patricia B. and Richard and Valerie A. In fact, the only negative unique to the A. household contained in the circuit court's findings is that Shanee's two siblings are "very demanding."[5]

In addition, Dr. O'Keefe testified that he is convinced that Richard and Valerie A. "are very fine parents for the two children they already have, and that they could handle this third child without difficulty." The evidence shows also that Richard and Valerie A. are mature, stable people. Although the psychological profiles indicated areas of concern for both Mr. A. and Mr. B., Dr. O'Keefe adjudged Mr. A. to be "a very competent parent." He described Mr. A. as "pretty mild tempered," and free of any type of alcohol or drug abuse, or unmanageable psychological conflicts or threatening stresses. According to Dr. O'Keefe, Mr. A. "probably would handle any life changes very effectively. . . . [H]e has a lot of emotional reserve to take the roll with the punches, take whatever comes his way." Dr. O'Keefe concluded that "it would be a reasonable choice to place [Shanee] with [the As]," and added that "[t]he only disadvantage I see from [the As] is that [Shanee's two siblings] are very, what I'm going to call, high maintenance kids."

In light of this evidence concerning Richard and Valerie A., in addition to the sibling preference found in W.Va. Code §49-2-14(e), this Court concludes that the fact that Shanee's two siblings are active and demanding does not constitute clear and convincing evidence that it is in Shanee's best interests to be separated from them. In other words, after considering all of the evidence adduced below, we are not left with a firm conviction that separation is in the best interests of Shanee and/or her siblings.

[5]The circuit court found that both Mr. A. and Mr. B. have psychological issues with placing Shanee in their household, and that both of them have minor criminal records.

Accordingly, we find that the circuit court erred in failing to give due consideration to the sibling preference in W.Va. Code § 49-2-14(e), and in ordering that Shanee be separated from her siblings.[6] [6]Richard and Valerie A. raised other assignments of error in their appeal to this Court, but because we grant them the relief which they seek for the reasons stated above, we do not find it necessary to address the other assignments of error.

We do note, however, that Mr. and Mrs. A. allege that the guardian ad litem acted improperly because he represented Mrs. B. in a "lemon law" case in 1996-1997 prior to representing Shanee in the instant case. Further, there was no disclosure made by the guardian ad litem to the trial court or Mr. and Mrs. A. of his prior representation of Mrs. B. before the circuit court ruled on Shanee's placement. In addition, during oral argument it was asserted that the guardian ad litem did not interview Mr. and Mrs. A. before recommending that Shanee be placed with Mr. and Mrs. B. The circuit court held a hearing on the guardian ad litem's alleged conflict of interest and found that the guardian ad litem did nothing improper. Because we have reversed on other grounds, we will not review the circuit court's order. We do not wish to leave the impression, however, that the conduct of the guardian ad litem in this case is the acceptable standard for guardians ad litem in future cases. Accordingly, we believe that a few appropriate comments are in order.

Children, in cases like the instant one, have a right to be represented by counsel in every stage of the proceedings. The chief duty of guardians ad litem is to act in the best interests of the children for whom they are appointed. Guardians ad litem must act with competence, reasonable diligence, and promptness. Also, guardians ad litem are to make a full and independent investigation of the facts involved in the proceeding prior to making their recommendations to the court. See Syllabus Point 5, In Re Jeffrey R.L., 190 W.Va. 24, 435 S.E.2d 162 (1993). A full and independent investigation includes interviewing all prospective parents when a child's placement is at issue.

We believe, further, that the duties set forth above require guardians ad litem to avoid conduct which reflects adversely on the undivided devotion owed by guardians ad litem to the children they represent. Guardians ad litem, therefore, have an affirmative duty to disqualify themselves following cognizance of good cause and to disclose facts that possibly could disqualify them from representing children in certain instances. Also, courts should be careful to appoint guardians ad litem who are free from any hint of conflict of interest.

Applying the above principles to the facts before us, we believe that it would have been better if Shanee's guardian ad litem had no prior recent relationship with either set of prospective parents. Also, the guardian ad litem should have disclosed his recent representation of Mrs. B. to the circuit court and to Mr. and Mrs. A. Finally, he should have interviewed Mr. and Mrs. A. before recommending Mr. and Mrs. B. for Shanee's placement.

We note in closing that the circuit court was faced in this case with a very difficult decision affecting the lives of three young children. Compounding the difficulty of the circuit court's decision was the task of choosing between prospective parents all of whom, the evidence indicates, are good people who would be responsible and capable custodians of Shanee. If the sibling preference articulated by this Court and set forth by the legislature in W.Va. Code § 49-2-14(e) were not a factor in determining Shanee's placement, we would be hard pressed to find fault with the circuit court's decision. Nevertheless, our law prefers, in the absence of compelling circumstances, that siblings enjoy the many advantages of growing up together and the attendant opportunities to forge meaningful, life-long relationships.

IV.

CONCLUSION

For the reasons stated above, we reverse the November 21, 2000 order of the Circuit Court of Nicholas County, and we order that the infant, Shanee, be placed for adoption with her siblings in the household of Richard and Valerie A.

Reversed.

Having said all of the above, however, we realize that this is not a perfect world and there are no perfect cases. Accordingly, we conclude by emphasizing that our statements are meant to be instructive in future cases, and we certainly do not find any intentional wrongdoing on the part of the guardian ad litem in this case.

Per Curiam:

This is an appeal by Artie Gene Shrewsbury (hereinafter "Appellant") from a November 6, 2001, order of the Circuit Court of Mercer County sentencing him to four consecutive terms of one to five years in the penitentiary and five years probation upon his conviction of seven counts of first degree sexual assault and four counts of first degree sexual abuse. The Appellant contends that the lower court erred in admitting the testimony of the children's play therapist regarding statements made by the alleged victims of abuse. Upon thorough review of the record and the arguments of the parties, we disagree with the Appellant's contentions and affirm the lower court.

I. Factual and Procedural History

On October 11, 2000, the Appellant was indicted for seven counts of first degree sexual assault and four counts of first degree sexual abuse. The indictment alleged that, from November 1996 through November 1999, the Appellant had engaged in sexual intercourse with his step-nephews, J.C., a minor under the age of eleven years, and R.S., the younger brother of J.C.[1] The Appellant's trial was conducted on August 30 and 31, 2001. During trial, the children's mother, Debra. S., testified that she had been concerned about the behavior of the children and had consulted Southern Highlands Community Mental Health Center regarding J.C.'s behavior problems in 1997. The children's mother also admitted J.C. for an evaluation and observation at Highland Hospital in December 1997, due to violence toward his younger brother and threats of suicide. J.C. thereafter spent approximately one year living with a cousin and her husband. Upon his return to his family, the children's mother testified that she began to notice disturbing behavior in both boys, including touching one another's genitals and touching the genitals of animals. The children's mother testified that on November 10, 1999, J.C. informed her that his Uncle Artie, the Appellant, had touched him in private parts of his body. The children's mother also testified that R.S. admitted that the Appellant had also engaged in such contact with him.

Subsequent to this revelation, the children's mother scheduled counseling with Phyllis Hasty, a children's counselor and play therapist at Southern Highlands Community Mental Health Center. At trial, Ms. Hasty testified that she engaged in several forms of child-directed play therapy with the boys, including activities such as workbooks, drawing pictures, letter writing, painting, and hitting an "anger bop bag" to express feelings. Ms. Hasty testified that the children had talked to her about Artie touching and fondling them, as well as requests from Artie that the children also touch him. Ms. Hasty also testified that the children informed her that oral sex was involved, with J.C. offering the statement that "he didn't understand about the white stuff that comes out of Artie's thing." Ms. Hasty explained that the children had told her that they witnessed each other being abused. R.S. related an incident to Ms. Hasty in which Artie had attempted to penetrate R.S. while J.C. watched.

II. Standard of Review

A trial court's rulings on the admissibility of evidence, "including those affecting constitutional rights, are reviewed under an abuse of discretion standard." State v. Marple, 197 W. Va. 47, 51, 475 S.E.2d 47, 51 (1996). In syllabus point two of State v. Peyatt, 173 W. Va. 317, 315 S.E.2d 574 (1983), this Court explained: "'Rulings on the admissibility of evidence are largely within a trial court's sound discretion and should not be disturbed unless there has been an abuse of discretion.' State v. Louk, 171 W. Va. 639, [643,] 301 S.E.2d 596, 599 (1983). "

III. Discussion

The Appellant attacks the admissibility of the testimony of witness Phyllis Hasty on two grounds.[2] First, he maintains that Ms. Hasty should not have been permitted to provide information to the jury regarding comments made by the children and that such testimony violated the Appellant's right to confront his accusers. Second, the Appellant contends that

[2]The Appellant fails to include any formal assertion of "assignments of error" in his petition for appeal, which also serves as his brief. Based upon this Court's reading of the Appellant's petition for appeal, we interpret the Appellant's apparent assignments of error and divide them into two essential components.

Ms. Hasty should not have been permitted to testify regarding her therapy with the child victims which involved play therapy.[3]

A. Constitutional Right To Confront Witnesses

1. Unavailability Issue

The Appellant asserts that the lower court improperly admitted the therapist's testimony regarding the statements of the children without first determining that the children were unavailable to testify at trial. The Appellant asserts that the trial court's admission of such statements consequently violated his constitutional right to confront his accusers.[4] In syllabus point two of State v. James Edward S., 184 W. Va. 408, 400 S.E.2d 843 (1990), this Court explained: "The two central requirements for admission of extrajudicial testimony under the Confrontation Clause contained in the Sixth Amendment to the United States Constitution are: (1) demonstrating the unavailability of the witness to testify; and (2) proving the reliability of the witness's out-of-court statement." In syllabus point two of State v. Kennedy, 205 W. Va. 224, 517 S.E.2d 457 (1999), however, this Court substantially modified that holding, as follows:

[3]The Appellant does acknowledge that the children had disclosed the sexual abuse to their mother prior to any contact with Ms. Hasty.

[4]The Appellant does not assign error to the admission of the mother's testimony concerning the statements of the children; nor does he assign error to the admission of the testimony of a juvenile probation officer, Ms. Kerry Buzzo, regarding the emotional distress suffered by the children upon seeing the Appellant in a parking lot at a court hearing.

> We modify our holding in James Edward S., 184 W. Va. 408, 400 S.E.2d 843 (1990), to comply with the United States Supreme Court's subsequent pronouncements regarding the application of its decision in Ohio v. Roberts, 448 U.S. 56, 100 S.Ct. 2531, 65 L.Ed.2d 597 (1980), to hold that the unavailability prong of the Confrontation Clause inquiry required by syllabus point one of James Edward S. is only invoked when the challenged extrajudicial statements were made in a prior judicial proceeding.

In Kennedy, this Court concluded: "Given the fact that the extrajudicial statement in this case -- the autopsy report -- does not involve statements given in a prior judicial proceeding, we conclude that the unavailability analysis pertinent to the Confrontation Clause inquiry under James Edward S. is not applicable." 205 W. Va. at 229, 517 S.E.2d at 462.

This issue of the role of unavailability in a determination of admissibility was also addressed in State v. Pettrey, 209 W. Va. 449, 549 S.E.2d 323 (2001), a case very similar to the one at bar. In Pettrey, this Court evaluated the admissibility of a play therapist's testimony regarding statements made by two young children describing sexual abuse. This Court analyzed issues similar to those raised by the Appellant in the present case and concluded that "the statements made by the children to Ms. Akers [the victim's teacher] and Ms. Hasty [the victim's therapist] were obviously not made in a prior judicial proceeding. Therefore, the unavailability analysis pertinent to the Confrontation Clause is not applicable." Id. at 457, 549 S.E.2d at 331.

Likewise, the challenged statements in the case sub judice were made to the therapist after the children had revealed the abuse to their mother. Since there is no issue regarding a statement made at a prior judicial proceeding, we concluded that the unavailability issue is not relevant, and the State was not required to establish that the children were unavailable to testify prior to introducing the testimony of the play therapist regarding statements made by the children.[5]

2. Reliability Issue

The Appellant also attacks the admissibility of the statements in the present case based upon the alleged absence of reliability. As this Court recognized in syllabus point four of State v. Mason, 194 W. Va. 221, 460 S.E.2d 36 (1995),

> "Even though the unavailability requirement has been met, the Confrontation Clause contained in the Sixth Amendment to the United States Constitution mandates the exclusion of evidence that does not bear adequate indicia of reliability. Reliability can usually be inferred where the evidence falls within a firmly rooted hearsay exception." Syllabus Point 5, State v. James Edward S., 184 W. Va. 408, 400 S.E.2d 843 (1990).

[5]The Appellant also references West Virginia Code § 62-6B-1 to -5 (2001) (Supp. 2002) and suggests that these statutory procedures could have been utilized to procure the testimony of the child witnesses through closed-circuit television. West Virginia Code § 62-6B-3 authorizes such testimony "[u]pon a written motion filed by the prosecuting attorney, and upon findings of fact determined pursuant to subsection (b) of this section. . . ." A request for implementation of this manner of procuring child testimony was not made in the present case.

In syllabus point six of Mason, this Court further explained: "For purposes of the Confrontation Clause found in the Sixth Amendment to the United States Constitution and Section 14 of Article III of the West Virginia Constitution, no independent inquiry into reliability is required when the evidence falls within a firmly rooted hearsay exception."

In Ohio v. Roberts, 448 U.S. 56 (1980), the United States Supreme Court clarified that hearsay evidence that falls under a firmly rooted exception to the hearsay rule or alternatively, when such evidence is accompanied by "particularized guarantees of trustworthiness," is admissible without any affront to the Confrontation Clause. Id. at 66. Specifically, the Roberts Court held that "[r]eliability can be inferred without more in a case where the evidence falls within a firmly rooted hearsay exception." Id.

In syllabus point four of State v. Edward Charles L., 183 W. Va. 641, 398 S.E.2d 123 (1990), this Court explained:

> The following [is] . . . not excluded by the hearsay rule, even though the declarant is available as a witness: . . . (4) Statements for Purposes of Medical Diagnosis or Treatment. Statements made for purposes of medical diagnosis or treatment and describing medical history, or past or present symptoms, pain, or sensations, or the inception or general character of the cause or external source thereof insofar as reasonably pertinent to diagnosis or treatment. W.Va.R.Evid. 803(4).

> The two-part test set for admitting hearsay statements pursuant to W.Va.R.Evid. 803(4) is (1) the declarant's motive in > making the statements must be consistent with the purposes of promoting treatment, and (2) the content of the statement must be such as is reasonably relied upon by a physician in treatment or diagnosis.

The issue of reliability and reliance upon Rule 803(4) was also raised in Pettrey. In that case, this Court affirmed the lower court's finding that Ms. Hasty's testimony in Pettrey was reliable because it fell within the medical diagnosis or treatment exception to the hearsay rule.[6] The Pettrey Court reviewed the Edward Charles L. analysis quoted above and determined that > [t]he statements made to Ms. Hasty by the children regarding the sexual abuse were made in a therapeutic context. Her sole involvement with K.R. and D.R. was diagnosis and treatment. Also, the statements were such that they were reasonably relied upon by Ms. Hasty in her diagnosis and treatment. Ms. Hasty's testimony was properly admitted at trial.

[6]See also In re Jessica C., 690 A.2d 1357, 1363 (R.I. 1997) ("the statements to Tovar [a therapist] were helpful in determining whether Heather had been sexually abused and in assessing her treatment needs, and therefore, the testimony was properly admitted under Rule 803(4)"); Moore v. State, 82 S.W.3d 399, 410 n. 3 (Ct. App. Texas 2002) ("Courts have been willing to construe the exceptions to the rule against hearsay broadly to permit out-of-court statements of alleged victims of child abuse to be admitted into evidence as excited utterances, statements for purposes of medical treatment, or under the residual exception of the hearsay rule"); Gohring v. State, 967 S.W.2d 459 (Ct. App. Texas 1998) (finding that victim's statements to drama therapist were admissible in sexual assault case under exception to hearsay rule as statements made for purposes of medical diagnosis or treatment); Dependency of M.P., 882 P.2d 1180, 1184 (Wash. 1994) (holding that proponent of statement made by child to doctor or therapist may utilize hearsay exception for statements for medical diagnosis or treatment and "should not have to overcome such a presumption" that young children lack ability to understand that their statements are for purpose of getting help for sickness, pain or emotional discomfort).

209 W. Va. at 460, 549 S.E.2d at 334. The Pettrey Court concluded as follows in syllabus point nine:

> When a social worker, counselor, or psychologist is trained in play therapy and thereafter treats a child abuse victim with play therapy, the therapist's testimony is admissible at trial under the medical diagnosis or treatment exception to the hearsay rule, West Virginia Rule of Evidence 803(4), if the declarant's motive in making the statement is consistent with the purposes of promoting treatment and the content of the statement is reasonably relied upon by the therapist for treatment. The testimony is inadmissible if the evidence was gathered strictly for investigative or forensic purposes.

We find no legitimate basis upon which to distinguish the circumstances of the present case from those evaluated by this Court in Pettrey. We consequently conclude that the statements of the children to the therapist fall within the medical diagnosis or treatment exception to the hearsay rule and thereby possess sufficient indicia of reliability to satisfy the reliability requirement of the Confrontation Clause. We affirm the decision of the lower court in this regard.

B. Testimony of Ms. Hasty as a Play Therapist

The Appellant also appears to assert that Ms. Hasty's testimony should not have been admitted because her mechanisms for facilitating discussion with the children were based upon the concept of play therapy. The Appellant did not, however, assert a proper objection to such subject matter during trial. Although counsel for the Appellant did object to two questions during Ms. Hasty's testimony which would have elicited an opinion from Ms. Hasty, neither of these objections was founded upon the grounds now asserted on appeal.[7] [7]Counsel for the Appellant was provided with adequate opportunity to advance an objection to Ms. Hasty's testimony, had he so desired. The lower court specifically inquired of defense counsel whether he intended to raise an objection to Ms. Hasty's testimony:

> THE COURT: I don't know if we need to - - to do that now or at a later time, I assume you're gonna object to Ms. Hasty, just for the record?

> THE COURT: Well, I just thought you wanted to make that for the record, but in any event we'll be in recess for about ten minutes.

Counsel for the Appellant did object during a line of questioning concerning the issue of whether Ms. Hasty always endorsed what children told her during therapy. When Ms. Hasty provided an answer in which she estimated the percentage of time she believes children give her unreliable information, defense counsel made the following objection:

> MR. WILLIAMS: Your Honor, I'm gonna object at this time and I'd like to come to the bar.
> THE COURT: The jury just relax a moment and we'll take up the objection.

This Court has consistently held that "[o]bjections on non-jurisdictional issues, must be made in the lower court to preserve such issues for appeal." Loar v. Massey, 164 W. Va. 155, 159, 261 S.E.2d 83, 86 (1979). "'Where objections were not shown to have been made in the trial court, and the matters concerned were not jurisdictional in character, such objections will not be considered on appeal.' Syllabus Point 1, State Road Commission v. Ferguson, 148 W. Va. 742, 137 S.E.2d 206 (1964)." Syl. Pt. 3, O'Neal v. Peake Operating Co., 185 W. Va. 28, 404 S.E.2d 420 (1991).

The necessity for precise and specific objections was acknowledged by this Court in syllabus point two of State ex rel. Cooper v. Caperton, 196 W. Va. 208, 470 S.E.2d 162 (1996), as follows: "To preserve an issue for appellate review, a party must articulate it with such sufficient distinctiveness to alert a circuit court to the nature of the claimed defect." Rule 103 of the West Virginia Rule of Evidence is also indicative of this principle, providing in pertinent part, as follows:

> (a) Effect of errroneous ruling. – Error may not be predicated upon a ruling which admits or excludes evidence unless a substantial right of the party is affected, and

MS. GARTON: It's a part of the foundation.

THE COURT: The objection is overruled you may proceed.

> (1) Objection. – In case the ruling is one admitting evidence, a timely objection or motion to strike appears of record, stating the specific ground of objection, if the specific ground was not apparent from the context . . . .

In the case sub judice, based upon the Appellant's failure to raise an adequate objection, the issue of whether testimony regarding statements elicited during therapy sessions which included a component of play therapy should have been admitted at trial has not been preserved for appellate review. While the plain error doctrine has been utilized to correct errors of great magnitude even in the absence of an objection, we do not believe that the circumstances of this case warrant such a result. This Court explained the use of the plain error doctrine as follows in syllabus point seven of State v. Miller, 194 W. Va. 3, 459 S.E.2d 114 (1995): "To trigger application of the 'plain error' doctrine, there must be (1) an error; (2) that is plain; (3) that affects substantial rights; and (4) seriously affects the fairness, integrity, or public reputation of the judicial proceedings." In pertinent part of syllabus point four of State v. England, 180 W. Va. 342, 376 S.E.2d 548 (1988), this court stated that the plain error "doctrine is to be used sparingly and only in those circumstances where substantial rights are affected, or the truth-finding process is substantially impaired, or a miscarriage of justice would otherwise result."

We conclude that the lower court did not abuse its discretion in admitting testimony in the Appellant's trial. We consequently affirm the decision of the lower court.

Affirmed.

SYLLABUS BY THE COURT

1. "Although conclusions of law reached by a circuit court are subject to de novo review, when an action, such as an abuse and neglect case, is tried upon the facts without a jury, the circuit court shall make a determination based upon the evidence and shall make findings of fact and conclusions of law as to whether such child is abused or neglected. These findings shall not be set aside by a reviewing court unless clearly erroneous. A finding is clearly erroneous when, although there is evidence to support the finding, the reviewing court on the entire evidence is left with the definite and firm conviction that a mistake has been committed. However, a reviewing court may not overturn a finding simply because it would have decided the case differently, and it must affirm a finding if the circuit court's account of the evidence is plausible in light of the record viewed in its entirety." Syllabus Point 1, In the Interest of Tiffany Marie S., 196 W.Va. 223, 470 S.E.2d 177 (1996).

2. "Although parents have substantial rights that must be protected, the primary goal in cases involving abuse and neglect, as in all family law matters, must be the health and welfare of the children." Syllabus Point 3, In re Katie S., 198 W.Va. 79, 479 S.E.2d 589 (1996).

Per Curiam:

In this appeal from the Circuit Court of Roane County, we are asked to consider a circuit judge's order that dismissed an abuse and neglect petition involving four children that was filed by the West Virginia Department of Health and Human Resources ("DHHR"). While we find the judge's decision was likely correct based upon the evidence presented by the parties, we reverse based upon the new circumstances presented during the parties' arguments before this Court.

I.

The respondents in this case are Dawn K. (now Dawn B.) and Earl K.; they separated prior to the filing of the DHHR's petition in this case and are now divorced. Dawn is the mother of Skyelan H., whose natural father is unknown. Dawn and Earl are the parents of three other children: Earl K., Jr.; Mersadies K.; and Cody K.

In mid-April 2005, Mersadies was diagnosed with a severe pelvic infection that required a two-week hospitalization. On April 19th, the DHHR filed an abuse and neglect petition against both Dawn K. and Earl K. claiming that Mersadies was hospitalized only as a result of the DHHR's intervention, and alleged Dawn's inaction in seeking medical treatment constituted a threat to the safety and welfare of the four children (who were between the ages of two and five when the petition was filed). The DHHR also alleged that the respondents abused and/or neglected the children by allowing the oldest child, Skyelan, to accrue too many absences from kindergarten; by not having sufficient stocks of food in the house; and by Earl's past repeated bouts of domestic violence against Dawn. Based upon the DHHR's allegations, the circuit court entered an emergency order permitting the DHHR to remove the children from the household and place them in foster care.

After four hearings, on November 23, 2005, the circuit court entered a detailed order dismissing the DHHR's petition. The circuit court concluded that, while the mother had exhibited some mistakes of judgment and had poor budgeting skills, the DHHR had failed to prove by clear and convincing evidence that those errors constituted abuse or neglect.

Following entry of the dismissal order, on December 5, 2005, the guardian ad litem for the children revealed to the circuit judge some medical records suggesting that three of the children may have been subjected to sexual abuse. When that abuse occurred, and whether the respondents caused, contributed to, or could have prevented the abuse, was not offered. The guardian ad litem then moved the circuit judge for a stay of the dismissal order. The circuit judge denied the motion in an order dated January 17, 2006. The guardian ad litem now appeals the circuit judge's orders; the DHHR did not appeal the circuit judge's actions.

II.

In this case we are guided by two principles. First, the findings of a circuit court in an abuse and neglect case will not be set aside by a reviewing court unless they are clearly erroneous – that is, although there is evidence to support the findings, the reviewing court on the entire evidence is left with the definite and firm conviction that a mistake has been committed. Syllabus Point 1, In the Interest of Tiffany Marie S., 196 W.Va. 223, 470 S.E.2d 177 (1996). Second, "[a]lthough parents have substantial rights that must be protected, the primary goal in cases involving abuse and neglect, as in all family law matters, must be the health and welfare of the children." Syllabus Point 3, In re Katie S., 198 W.Va. 79, 479 S.E.2d 589 (1996).

The guardian ad litem for the children argues on appeal that the circuit court erred in concluding that the DHHR failed to establish that the allegations contained in the petition rose to a level of legal "abuse or neglect." See W.Va. Code, 49-1-3 [2006]. The respondent parents persuasively argue that the circuit court's decision dismissing the petition was correct. If the attention of this Court were solely upon the petition and the circuit court's decision thereon, our inclination is that the decision was correct.

We are, however, troubled by the additional evidence submitted into the record after the circuit court's decision. After entry of the court's dismissal order, the guardian ad litem proffered to the court evidence suggesting that three of the children may have been victims of sexual abuse. While the evidence, standing alone, proves nothing, the circuit court should have taken a more proactive role in compelling a further investigation of the evidence.

In other words, we believe that the circuit court was empowered to demand that the DHHR investigate and report to the circuit court whether the evidence could or should be the basis of further action to protect the interest of the children. See, e.g., Rules of Procedure for Child Abuse and Neglect Proceedings, Rule 3a [2006]; Rules of Practice and Procedure for Domestic Violence Civil Proceedings, Rule 25a [2006].

Further compounding our difficulty in resolving this case is a revelation by the parties during oral arguments before this Court: that a new petition alleging abuse and neglect has been filed against Dawn B. regarding the children. It appears that the circuit court has as a result of the new petition removed the children from the respondent mother's custody, and placed the children with the respondent father, Earl K.

On the basis of the parties' statements during oral argument, we find that the result which will best protect the interests of the children is to reverse the circuit court's decisions and remand the case. On remand, the court should give full consideration to the allegations raised by the guardian ad litem in this appeal, in conjunction with any allegations of abuse and neglect raised in the petition currently pending before the circuit court.

III.

The circuit court's November 23, 2005 and January 17, 2006 orders are reversed. The case is remanded, and the circuit court is ordered to consolidate this case with any pending petitions involving the children, and to fully consider all evidence pertaining to the alleged abuse and neglect of the children.

Reversed and Remanded with Directions.

JUSTICE STARCHER delivered the Opinion of the Court.

SYLLABUS BY THE COURT

1. "The appellate standard of review of questions of law answered and certified by a circuit court is de novo." Syllabus Point 1, Gallapoo v. Wal-Mart Stores, Inc., 197 W.Va. 172, 475 S.E.2d 172 (1996).

2. "When a certified question is not framed so that this Court is able to fully address the law which is involved in the question, then this Court retains the power to reformulate questions certified to it under both the Uniform Certification of Questions of Law Act found in W.Va. Code, 51-1A-1, et seq. and W.Va. Code, 58-5-2 [1967], the statute relating to certified questions from a circuit court of this State to this Court." Syllabus Point 3, Kincaid v. Mangum, 189 W.Va. 404, 432 S.E.2d 74 (1993).

3. When a child is the subject of an abuse or neglect or other proceeding in a circuit court pursuant to Chapter 49 of the West Virginia Code, the circuit court, and not the family court, has jurisdiction to establish a child support obligation for that child.

4. When a circuit judge enters an order on an abuse or neglect petition filed pursuant to Chapter 49 of the West Virginia Code, and in so doing alters the custodial and decision-making responsibility for the child and/or commits the child to the custody of the Department of Health and Human Resources, W.Va. Code, 49-7-5 [1936] requires the circuit judge to impose a support obligation upon one or both parents for the support, maintenance and education of the child. The entry of an order establishing a support obligation is mandatory; it is not optional.

5. Any order establishing a child support obligation in an abuse or neglect action filed pursuant to Chapter 49 of the West Virginia Code must use the Guidelines for Child Support Awards found in W.Va. Code, 48-13-101, et seq.

Starcher, J.:

The Circuit Court of Cabell County presents three certified questions to this Court relating to the jurisdiction of a family court to establish a parent's support obligation for a child, when the child is also the subject of an abuse or neglect proceeding in the circuit court. We are asked to decide whether in such cases the authority to impose a child support obligation lies in the circuit court or in the family court.

As set forth below, we find that jurisdiction to establish a child support obligation lies solely with the circuit court that is adjudicating, or has adjudicated, the custody and decision-making responsibility for the child as a result of an abuse or neglect petition.

I.
Facts & Background

The three certified questions in this case concern the child support obligation of a parent, whose children have been placed into the custody of the Department of Health and Human Resources as a result of an abuse or neglect proceeding filed in a circuit court, all pursuant to Chapter 49 of the West Virginia Code. The questions essentially ask us to resolve a single, jurisdictional question: between a circuit court and a family court, which court should calculate and enforce the parent's child support obligation?

On June 30, 2003, the Department of Health and Human Resources ("the Department") filed a petition in the Circuit Court of Cabell County alleging that the four children of Kimberly Smith had been abused or neglected. Pursuant to a circuit court order, the children were temporarily removed from Ms. Smith's custody and placed into foster care. After several hearings, the circuit court concluded in an order dated June 7, 2004 that clear and convincing evidence of abuse and neglect had been presented and terminated Ms. Smith's parental rights to the children. The Department was granted permanent physical and legal custody of the children, and they were subsequently placed with foster families.

While the children were in temporary foster care pursuant to the circuit court's order, on February 11, 2004, the Department initiated a separate civil action by filing a new petition in the Family Court of Cabell County seeking to establish a child support obligation for Ms. Smith. The Department alleged in the petition for child support that it was "currently paying expenses for the minor children" and that Ms. Smith "owes a duty of support to the children which she is not meeting." The Department therefore requested that the family court enter an order requiring Ms. Smith "to pay such sum or sums of money sufficient for the support and maintenance of the minor children, in accordance with the child support formula, while the children are in foster care[.]"

The family court, however, refused to exercise jurisdiction over the Department's petition for child support. In an order dated June 11, 2004, the family court stated:

> The Family Court does not have jurisdiction in the present case. . . . Jurisdiction for establishing the support obligation lies exclusively with the [Circuit] Court that Ordered the placement of the child(ren).

The family court's order dismissed the Department's petition for child support.

The Department appealed the family court's dismissal order to the circuit court. The Department argued to the circuit court that, as a general proposition, it was experiencing difficulty establishing child support obligations in abuse and neglect cases because family courts and circuit courts were in disagreement concerning which court could or should establish the support obligation. As the Department stated:

> [T]he Family Court dismissed the action holding that the Family Court lacks jurisdiction to establish child support and that jurisdiction lies wholly with the Circuit Court which removed the child from the custody of the parent. . . .
> The [Department] has previously appealed the same ruling of the Family Court [of Cabell County] regarding jurisdiction in eleven (11) other cases. In each of the appeals assigned to the Honorable Alfred E. Ferguson, the order of dismissal by the Family Court was affirmed . . . The appeals assigned to the Honorable Dan O'Hanlon were remanded to the Family Court for entry of a support order. . . .
> . . . [The Department] is experiencing difficulty establishing the federally-mandated child support obligation in Chapter 49 [abuse and neglect] cases as the split of decision regarding jurisdiction is typical across the State.

The Department therefore asked the circuit court to certify questions to this Court to clarify the procedure that the Department, family courts and circuit courts should pursue to establish a parent's child support obligation when an abuse or neglect petition has been filed.

In an order dated December 15, 2004, the circuit court certified the following questions to this Court:[1]

> Certified Question One:
> Does the Family Court have jurisdiction to establish child support if the same child is also the subject of a pending proceeding or order under Chapter 49 of the West Virginia Code, when no order of the Circuit Court addresses child support?
>
> Answer of the Circuit Court: Yes.
>
> Certified Question Two:
> May the Circuit Court transfer jurisdiction to the Family Court to calculate child support in a proceeding under Chapter 49 of the West Virginia Code by administrative order en masse?
>
> Answer of the Circuit Court: No.
> Certified Question Three:
> May the Circuit Court transfer jurisdiction to the Family Court to calculate child support in a proceeding under Chapter 49 of the West Virginia Code by administrative order on a case by case basis?
> Answer of the Circuit Court: No.

[1]This Court recently received a Report on the Overlap of Child Abuse and Neglect Cases in Family and Circuit Courts from the West Virginia Court Improvement Oversight Board. The report identifies four problematic areas of overlap between circuit courts and family courts in the context of abuse and neglect actions, and suggests solutions for the Court, the Legislature, the Executive and other individuals to pursue, so as to more efficiently address the needs of abused and neglected children. One of those four areas is, coincidentally, encompassed by the questions certified in the instant case.

II.
Standard of Review

"The appellate standard of review of questions of law answered and certified by a circuit court is de novo." Syllabus Point 1, Gallapoo v. Wal-Mart Stores, Inc., 197 W.Va. 172, 475 S.E.2d 172 (1996).

III.
Discussion

It is well established that this Court has the authority to reformulate certified questions.

> When a certified question is not framed so that this Court is able to fully address the law which is involved in the question, then this Court retains the power to reformulate questions certified to it under both the Uniform Certification of Questions of Law Act found in W.Va. Code, 51-1A-1, et seq. and W.Va. Code, 58-5-2 [1967], the statute relating to certified questions from a circuit court of this State to this Court.

Syllabus Point 3, Kincaid v. Mangum, 189 W.Va. 404, 432 S.E.2d 74 (1993).

After considering the record and the briefs and arguments of the Department, we believe that the circuit court's three certified questions should be reformulated and distilled down into this single question:

> If a child is either the subject of an abuse or neglect proceeding in a circuit court, or the subject of a circuit court order affecting the custodial or decision-making responsibility for the child pursuant to Chapter 49 of the West Virginia Code, does the circuit court have exclusive jurisdiction to establish a child support obligation for that child?

As we discuss below, we believe that the answer to this question is "Yes."

We begin our analysis of this question by looking to the historical purpose behind the creation of the family court system, and its relationship to the circuit courts.

In October 1997 this Court entered an order that established the "Commission on the Future of the West Virginia Judicial System." The Commission was charged with examining the State court system and proposing "structural, organizational, and procedural changes that will ensure a just, effective, responsive, and efficient court system into the next century." One of the many areas examined by the Commission was the inefficient, piecemeal approach taken by the then-existing court system in addressing legal issues concerning parents and children.

After extensive public hearings and deliberations, the Commission determined – as the law stood in 1998 – that families entering the court system faced a "fragmented and duplicative" system:

> [A] family in crisis could encounter five different decision makers in the course of attempting to resolve its problems: a magistrate, to hold hearings on a domestic violence petition; a family law master, to hear evidence on a divorce; a circuit judge, to conduct an abuse and neglect proceeding; a different circuit judge to conduct a delinquency proceeding regarding the behavior of one of the children; and a panel of county commissioners to conduct a proceeding regarding the contested legal guardianship of a minor.

Report of the Commission on the Future of the West Virginia Judicial System at 34 [1998]. The Commission recognized that judicial decision makers, acting without coordination, were likely to issue inefficient and/or conflicting orders:

> [W]hen there is no coordination between different segments of the court system, it is possible that a judge hearing an abuse and neglect case may not be aware of a pending divorce, a disputed non-testamentary legal guardianship, a juvenile delinquency proceeding, and/or a recent domestic violence petition. This lack of integration and consolidation does not serve the best interest of the families, interferes with the ability of the system to provide a quality resolution, and does not make efficient use of judicial resources.

Id.

To resolve this problem, in December 1998 the Commission proposed that the Legislature establish a "unified family court." The Commission, relying upon studies by the American Bar Association and upon an examination of family court systems devised by twenty-five other states, proposed a "one judge, one family" system. Under this system, one judicial officer would be empowered to make decisions concerning families, parents and children. The unified family court system crafted by the Commission contemplated that one, specially-trained judge[2] would have "comprehensive jurisdiction of all family law cases, including juvenile matters," and that all cases pertaining to one family – such as divorce, domestic violence, paternity, or abuse and neglect – would be assigned to that judge. Id. at 34-37.

[2]The Commission recommended that

> . . . Unified Family Court judges gain office in the same manner, and have the same status, pay, and benefits as circuit judges. . . . Other states with Unified Family Courts have determined that equal stature for Unified Family Court Judges and adequate additional support personnel are absolutely essential to the success of this plan.

Report of the Commission on the Future of the West Virginia Judicial System at 35.

The Legislature responded to the Commission's recommendations by creating the current family court system. The Legislature did not, however, wholly adopt the recommended "one judge, one family" concept and did not establish the family court system as a "unified court" with the powers necessary for resolution of all family law matters. Instead, the system adopted by the Legislature makes clear that "[a] family court is a court of limited jurisdiction." W.Va. Code, 51-2A-2(d) [2004]. We interpreted this language in State ex rel. Silver v. Wilkes, 213 W.Va. 692, 584 S.E.2d 548 (2003) to mean that the Legislature established the family courts as courts of limited jurisdiction that are "inferior" to the circuit courts.[3]

The Legislature did consolidate jurisdiction over many family law issues into the original jurisdiction of the family courts. Following the recommendations of the Commission, family courts now have jurisdiction over divorces – including the power to dissolve a marriage, equitably distribute marital property, and determine child and spousal support obligations[4] – and have contempt power to enforce any family court decrees.[5]

[3]As we stated in Syllabus Point 4 of State ex rel. Silver v. Wilkes:

> Pursuant to Article VIII, Sections 6 and 16 of the West Virginia Constitution, W.Va. Code § 51-2-2 (1978), and the Family Court statutes, W.Va. Code §§ 51-2A-1 to 23 (2001), family courts are courts of limited jurisdiction and are inferior to circuit courts. Family courts are, therefore, subject to both the appellate jurisdiction and the original jurisdiction of the circuit courts in this State.

[4]W.Va. Code, 51-2A-2(a)(1) [2004] states:

> The family court shall exercise jurisdiction over . . . All actions

Family courts also have jurisdiction over actions seeking child support, when the parents have never married;[6] over actions to establish paternity;[7] over civil domestic violence cases seeking a protective order;[8] and over infant guardianship cases.[9]

But not all areas of family law were placed before the family courts. One significant area of family law discussed by the Commission remains within the sole jurisdiction of the circuit courts: child abuse or neglect proceedings under Chapter 49 of the West Virginia Code.

In the instant case we are asked to determine whether, and to what extent (if any), family courts may exercise jurisdiction over a parent's child support obligation, when > for divorce, annulment or separate maintenance brought under the provisions of article three, four or five, chapter forty-eight of this code[.]

W.Va. Code, 51-2A-2(a)(8) and (9) permit a family court judge to enter temporary orders in such proceedings, and to later modify any orders entered.

[5]See W.Va. Code, 51-2A-2(a)(10) [2004], giving family courts authority "to enforce an order of spousal or child support or to enforce an order for a parenting plan or other allocation of custodial responsibility or decision-making responsibility for a child," including through civil contempt proceedings. See also, W.Va. Code, 51-2A-9 [2001] (setting forth the contempt powers of a family court judge).

[6]See W.Va. Code, 51-2A-2(a)(2) [2004].

[7]See W.Va. Code, 51-2A-2(a)(3) [2004].

[8]W.Va. Code, 51-2A-2(a)(12) [2004] gives family courts jurisdiction over "[a]ll final hearings in domestic violence proceedings[.]"

[9]W.Va. Code, 51-2A-2(a)(17) [2004] gives family courts jurisdiction over "[a]ll proceedings relating to the appointment of guardians or curators of minor children . . . exercising concurrent jurisdiction with the circuit court."

the child is subject to an abuse or neglect proceeding in the circuit court. To answer this question we must examine the various legislative enactments delineating the jurisdiction of the family and circuit courts in the context of abuse or neglect cases.

W.Va. Code, 49-6-1 [2005] clearly states that an abuse or neglect petition may only be filed in "the circuit court in the county in which the child resides[.]" Likewise, the statute setting forth the jurisdiction of the family courts, W.Va. Code, 51-2A-2(c) [2004], states that when an abuse or neglect petition is filed in a circuit court, and "an action for divorce, annulment or separate maintenance" is at the same time pending in a family court, the family court must defer to the circuit court. As the statute states, any orders of the circuit court "shall supercede and take precedence over an order of the family court respecting the allocation of custodial and decision-making responsibility for the child between the parents."[10]

[10]W.Va. Code, 51-2A-2(c) [2004] states:

> If an action for divorce, annulment or separate maintenance is pending and a petition is filed pursuant to the provisions of article six, chapter forty-nine of this code alleging abuse or neglect of a child by either of the parties to the divorce, annulment or separate maintenance action, the orders of the circuit court in which the abuse or neglect petition is filed shall supercede and take precedence over an order of the family court respecting the allocation of custodial and decision-making responsibility for the child between the parents. If no order for the allocation of custodial and decision-making responsibility for the child between the parents has been entered by the family court in the pending action for divorce, annulment or separate maintenance, the family court shall stay any further proceedings concerning the allocation of custodial and decision-making

The instant case arises, however, because of what the family court jurisdiction statute regarding abuse or neglect jurisdiction does not say. W.Va. Code, 51-2A-2(c) places limitations upon the family court's "allocation of custodial and decision-making responsibility;" it says nothing of the family court's power to create and enforce a child support obligation. Concerning that power, W.Va. Code, 51-2A-2(a)(2) and (10) state:

> The family court shall exercise jurisdiction over the following matters: . . .
> (2) All actions to obtain orders of child support . . . ; . . .
> (10) All actions brought, including civil contempt proceedings, to enforce an order of spousal or child support. . . .

Relying upon these two subsections, the Department argues that family courts retain jurisdiction to determine a parent's support obligation for a child who is subject to an abuse or neglect petition. The Department asserts that it may therefore turn to the family courts to obtain an order for the support of a minor child whenever a parent is obligated to support the > responsibility for the child between the parents and defer to the orders of the circuit court in the abuse or neglect proceedings.

We note that this provision regarding the jurisdiction of the family court appears to apply only when a "divorce, annulment or separate maintenance" action has been filed between the parents of a child who is the subject of a later abuse or neglect petition. The statute is silent regarding the course of action to be taken when any other type of action – such as a paternity action or an action to establish child support between unmarried individuals – is filed between the parents of the child.

child and is failing to do so[11] – even when a circuit court has placed that child in the custody of the Department as a result of the filing of an abuse or neglect petition.

After carefully examining the statutory scheme concerning the establishment of child support obligations in abuse or neglect cases, we reject the Department's interpretation of W.Va. Code, 51-2A-2. We believe that when an abuse or neglect petition has been filed, the family courts are divested of jurisdiction to establish a support obligation for the child and that the duty to establish a support obligation lies solely with the circuit court.

The circuit court's duty to impose a child support obligation upon hearing an abuse or neglect petition is found in W.Va. Code, 49-7-5 [1936]. That statute states, in part:

> If it appears upon the hearing of a petition under this chapter that a person legally liable for the support of the child is able to contribute to the support of such child, the court or judge shall order the person to pay the state department, institution,

[11]The Department also cites to W.Va. Code, 48-14-101 [2001] as its authority to initiate a separate action in family court to establish a child support obligation when an abuse or neglect petition regarding the child is pending in circuit court. The statute states:

> An action may be brought in family court to obtain an order for the support of a minor child when:
> (1) The child has a parent and child relationship with an obligor;
> (2) The obligor is not meeting an obligation to support the child;
>
> (3) An enforceable order for the support of the child by the obligor has not been entered by a court of competent jurisdiction; and > organization, or private person to whom the child was committed, a reasonable sum from time to time for the support, maintenance, and education of the child.
> (4) There is no pending action for divorce, separate maintenance or annulment in which the obligation of support owing from the obligor to the child is at issue.

This statute – adopted in 1936 – indicates that a circuit court "shall" require a parent to pay support for a child to the Department if the parent "is able to contribute to the support of such child." The determination of whether and how much a parent can contribute to the support of a child is not, however, a visceral, unfettered decision for the circuit court; rather, the existence and amount of a child support obligation under W.Va. Code, 49-7-5 must now be computed in light of recent statutes which pertain to the calculation of a support obligation. See Syllabus Point 12, Vest v. Cobb, 138 W.Va. 660, 76 S.E.2d 885 (1953) ("The Legislature, when it enacts legislation, is presumed to know of its prior enactments."); Syllabus Point 5, State v. Snyder, 64 W.Va. 659, 63 S.E. 385 (1908) ("A statute should be so read and applied as to make it accord with the spirit, purposes and objects of the general system of law of which it is intended to form a part; it being presumed that the legislators who drafted and passed it were familiar with all existing law, applicable to the subject-matter, whether constitutional, statutory or common, and intended the statute to harmonize completely with the same and aid in the effectuation of the general purpose and design thereof, if its terms are consistent therewith.").

The current statutory scheme regarding child support obligations requires judges – family court or circuit court – to use the Guidelines for Child Support Awards found in Article 13 of Chapter 48 to calculate the existence and amount of a parent's child support obligation. The Guidelines for Child Support Awards are not limited to being applied only by family courts, but are to be used by any court that is assessing any child support obligation. Specifically, W.Va. Code, 48-13-701 [2001] states that "[t]he guidelines in child support awards apply as a rebuttable presumption to all child support orders established or modified in West Virginia." (Emphasis added). The statute mandates that the Guidelines "be applied to all actions in which child support is being determined including . . . foster care, . . . public assistance, nonpublic assistance and support decrees arising despite nonmarriage of the parties."[12]

The Guidelines for Child Support Awards were designed by the Legislature to ensure uniformity in child support awards, and to increase predictability for parents, children, and "other persons who are directly affected by child support orders" – which we interpret to include the Department of Health and Human Resources in the context of an abuse and neglect petition. It is therefore presumed that any order entered by a court in accordance with the Guidelines "is the correct amount of child support to be awarded." W.Va. Code, 48-13-

[12]W.Va. Code, 48-13-701 [2001] states:

> The guidelines in child support awards apply as a rebuttable presumption to all child support orders established or modified in West Virginia. The guidelines must be applied to all actions in which child support is being determined including temporary orders, interstate (URESA and UIFSA), domestic violence, foster care, divorce, nondissolution, public assistance, nonpublic assistance and support decrees arising despite nonmarriage of the parties. The guidelines must be used by the court as the basis for reviewing adequacy of child support levels in uncontested cases as well as contested hearings.

101 [2001].[13] The Guidelines may, however, be disregarded or adjusted to "accommodate the needs of the child or children or the circumstances of the parent or parents" only if the court makes specific findings that the use of the Guidelines is inappropriate. W.Va. Code, 48-13-702 [2001].

Furthermore, "to ensure greater uniformity" and "to increase predictability" as contemplated by the Legislature in enacting the Guidelines, orders concerning child support obligations must be entered promptly. When support orders are not entered at the same time that the circuit court alters the allocation of custodial and decision-making responsibility for the child, the child's parents and the Department are deprived of the ability to order their affairs. If the circuit court gives custody of the child to one parent or another responsible person in the abuse or neglect action, then in the absence of a support obligation upon the non-custodial parent, the custodial parent or responsible person must fall back on the resources of the Department. If the court places the child into the sole custody of the Department, in the absence of a support obligation, taxpayers must unfairly foot the entire bill. In either case, when a court delays the calculation of a support obligation, the parents

[13]W.Va. Code, 48-13-101 [2001] states:

> This article establishes guidelines for child support award amounts so as to ensure greater uniformity by those persons who make child support recommendations and enter child support orders and to increase predictability for parents, children and other persons who are directly affected by child support orders. There is a rebuttable presumption, in any proceeding before a court for the award of child support, that the amount of the award which would result from the application of these guidelines is the correct amount of child support to be awarded.

may be unfairly surprised to be forced to pay past support, education or medical expenses paid by the Department, in addition to making current, monthly support payments.

The record in this case prompts us to raise one additional issue of concern regarding the prompt resolution of child abuse or neglect actions. In 2004, the Court – through the assistance of the Court Improvement Oversight Board – issued the Judicial Benchbook for Child Abuse and Neglect Proceedings and issued a series of computerized forms called the Juvenile Abuse and Neglect Information System.[14] The Benchbook contains a summary of the statutes, rules, caselaw and procedures in abuse and neglect cases, as well as checklists to ensure a thorough review of each case. Tied into the Benchbook is the Juvenile Abuse and Neglect Information System – better known by its initials "JANIS" – which is a computerized tool for judges and other practitioners to use to expedite the handling of child abuse and neglect cases. The JANIS system improves the speed and quality of judges' and attorneys' work product by automating the creation of case orders and motions. It is our understanding that many practitioners and judges are unaware of these two resources. We would suggest, in the future, that judges, attorneys, and the Department (and thereby children and their parents) would substantially benefit from the use of these resources in the adjudication of abuse and neglect cases.

[14]Both the Benchbook and JANIS are available on the Supreme Court of Appeals' internet website, www.state.wv.us/wvsca. The Benchbook may be downloaded or reviewed at www.state.wv.us/wvsca/benchbook_04/cover.htm, while the JANIS system may downloaded or accessed at www.wvjanis.com.

We therefore hold that when a child is the subject of an abuse or neglect or other proceeding in a circuit court pursuant to Chapter 49 of the West Virginia Code, the circuit court, and not the family court, has jurisdiction to establish a child support obligation for that child.

When a circuit judge enters an order on an abuse or neglect petition filed pursuant to Chapter 49 of the West Virginia Code, and in so doing alters the custodial and decision-making responsibility for the child and/or commits the child to the custody of the Department of Health and Human Resources, W.Va. Code, 49-7-5 [1936] requires the circuit judge to impose a support obligation upon one or both parents for the support, maintenance and education of the child. The entry of an order establishing a support obligation is mandatory; it is not optional.

Finally, any order establishing a child support obligation in an abuse or neglect action filed pursuant to Chapter 49 of the West Virginia Code must use the Guidelines for Child Support Awards found in W.Va. Code, 48-13-101, et seq.

IV.
Conclusion

The question before the Court is this:

> If a child is either the subject of an abuse or neglect proceeding in a circuit court, or the subject of a circuit court order affecting the custodial or decision-making responsibility for the child pursuant to Chapter 49 of the West Virginia Code, does the circuit court have exclusive jurisdiction to establish a child support obligation for that child?

We answer the certified question "Yes."

CHIEF JUSTICE MAYNARD delivered the Opinion of the Court.

SYLLABUS BY THE COURT

1. "Where a trial court is presented with a defendant's failure to disclose the identity of witnesses in compliance with West Virginia Rule of Criminal Procedure 16, the trial court must inquire into the reasons for the defendant's failure to comply with the discovery request. If the explanation offered indicates that the omission of the witness' identity was willful and motivated by a desire to obtain a tactical advantage that would minimize the effectiveness of cross-examination and the ability to adduce rebuttal evidence, it is consistent with the purposes of the compulsory process clause of the sixth amendment to the United States Constitution and article [III], section 14 of the West Virginia Constitution to preclude the witness from testifying." Syllabus Point 1, State v. Ward, 188 W.Va. 380, 424 S.E.2d 725 (1991).

2. "Each word of a statute should be given some effect and a statute must be construed in accordance with the import of its language. Undefined words and terms used in a legislative enactment will be given their common, ordinary and accepted meaning." Syllabus Point 6, in part, State ex rel. Cohen v. Manchin, 175 W.Va. 525, 336 S.E.2d 171 (1984).

3. The offense of child abuse creating a risk of injury as set forth in W.Va. Code § 61-8D-3(c) (1996) is committed when any person inflicts upon a minor physical injury by other than accidental means and by such action, creates a substantial possibility of serious bodily injury or death.

Maynard, Chief Justice:

This case is before this Court upon appeal of a final order of the Circuit Court of Marion County entered on April 19, 1999. In that order, the circuit court sentenced the appellant and defendant below, Thomas Snodgrass, to an indeterminate term of one to five years in the West Virginia State Penitentiary for his conviction of child abuse creating a risk of injury. The court further sentenced the appellant to one year in the Marion County Jail for his conviction of destruction of property and to one year in the Marion County Jail for his conviction of fleeing an officer.

In this appeal, the appellant contends that the circuit court committed constitutional error when it excluded the testimony of defense witness Lawrence Barnette. The appellant also contends that the evidence was insufficient to establish child abuse as a matter of law. The appellant further asserts that the circuit court erred by denying his motion to suppress his custodial statements. Finally, the appellant argues that the circuit court committed reversible error by improperly admitting the rebuttal testimony of Karen Caufield.

This Court has before it the petition for appeal, the entire record, and the briefs and argument of counsel. For the reasons set forth below, the final order of the circuit court is reversed.

I.

The appellant's convictions arose out of a domestic dispute with his ex-wife, Kim Haught. The dispute occurred on June 27, 1997, when Mrs. Haught and her husband, Matt Haught, arrived early to pick up Lee, the appellant and Mrs. Haught's son. Lee had spent the week with the appellant who maintained that Mrs. Haught was not supposed to pick him up until two days later. Mrs. Haught claimed that she was only two hours early.

When the Haughts arrived, the appellant was on a tractor mowing hay. Mrs. Haught put Lee in her car and started to drive away. The appellant approached the car to see what was happening. After some discussion, the Haughts drove away. The appellant got his car and followed the Haughts down the road. The Haughts claim that the appellant "chased" them and pulled his car in front of their car forcing them to turn down a dead-end road. However, a defense witness testified that the appellant did not pass the Haughts' car or exhibit any other improper driving behavior.

Eventually, the vehicles stopped. According to the Haughts, the appellant jumped on the hood of their car, tore off a side mirror, and broke the passenger side window with a rock causing glass to fall on all the occupants of the vehicle. Mrs. Haught testified that Lee sustained scratch marks and a cut finger from the broken glass. The appellant maintains that he jumped on the hood of the Haughts' car to keep them from running over him. He claims that he picked up a rock in self-defense against Matt Haught and that the rock went through the window when they got into a struggle.

Sergeant Donald Wheeler, a police officer from the town of Mannington, was the first to arrive on the scene. He had been notified by the Marion County Sheriff's Department which had been telephoned by Mrs. Haught on a cellular phone shortly after the dispute began. Sergeant Wheeler had been instructed not to allow anyone to leave the scene. Upon his arrival, the appellant told Sergeant Wheeler that nothing had happened and nothing was wrong. Shortly thereafter, two deputies from the Marion County Sheriff's Department arrived. After talking to the Haughts, one of the officers approached the appellant and told him he was under arrest.[1] The appellant attempted to run away, but the officers tackled him. He kicked one of the officers in the face before being subdued.

Following a three-day trial that began on July 28, 1998, the appellant was found guilty of child abuse creating a risk of injury, destruction of property, and fleeing an officer. He was acquitted of domestic battery of Mrs. Haught, battery of Mr. Haught, and unlawful assault on a police officer.[2]

II.

The appellant's primary assignment of error concerns the circuit court's refusal to allow defense witness Lawrence Barnette to testify. The appellant contends that by excluding Mr. Barnette's testimony, the circuit court violated his right to compulsory process under the Sixth Amendment to the United States Constitution and Article III, Section 14 of the West Virginia Constitution.[3] The circuit court

[1]The appellant maintains that he was never told that he was under arrest.

[2]One count of child abuse of the Haughts' 16-month-old daughter, Ali, who was also a passenger in the car on June 27, 1997, was dismissed prior to trial.

[3]The Sixth Amendment to the United States Constitution provides, in pertinent part, that "[i]n all criminal prosecutions, the accused shall enjoy the right . . . to have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor[.]" Likewise, Article III, Section 14 of the West Virginia Constitution refused to allow Mr. Barnette to testify because the appellant had not provided the State with a correct phone number for him pursuant to a pretrial discovery order.

Almost a month before trial, the appellant gave the State the names of fifty potential witnesses. The misspelled name of "Lawrence Burnett" was on the list. No addresses or telephone numbers were listed with any of the witnesses. Thus, the State filed a motion to exclude the testimony of all the defense witnesses, or in the alternative, to compel the appellant to disclose the addresses and telephone numbers of the witnesses along with a brief synopsis of their expected testimony. On July 20, 1998, the circuit court ruled that it would prohibit these witnesses from testifying unless the defense provided the State with the telephone numbers and/or addresses of the witnesses by 4:00 p.m. on July 22, 1998. In response, the appellant provided more specific information about eleven of the witnesses, and at some point, the State was given a phone number for Mr. Barnette. However, when the prosecutor called the phone number, he was told that Mr. Barnette did not live at that residence.

Mr. Barnette appeared on the first day of trial after having been served with a subpoena by the appellant's process server the previous day. An investigator for the State approached Mr. Barnette at that time, but he refused to talk to him. When Mr. Barnette was called to testify on the second day of trial, the State objected on the grounds that it had not been given a correct phone number for Mr. Barnette and as a result, had been unable to contact him prior to trial. Counsel for the appellant responded that he provides that, "[i]n all such [criminal] trials . . . there shall be awarded to [the accused] compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor."

had given the State the only phone number he had for Mr. Barnette and that even after Mr. Barnette was served the subpoena, he did not have an address or a correct phone number because Mr. Barnette was found on the street.

The appellant proffered that Mr. Barnette would testify that he was at the Satterfield farm where the altercation took place on June 27, 1997. He further stated that Mr. Barnette would testify that he observed a red car come down the road to the Satterfield farm and turn around. About a half hour later, Mr. Barnette observed the vehicle come back, this time followed by a white car.

The appellant claimed that Mr. Barnette's testimony supported his theory that his ex-wife had initiated the dispute so that she could obtain exclusive custody of Lee. He claimed that Mrs. Haught had "set him up" because she knew that he would follow her if she picked Lee up early. The appellant stated that Mr. Barnette's testimony showed that Mrs. Haught was selecting the site where she would drive to once he began following her.

In State v. Ward, 188 W.Va. 380, 424 S.E.2d 725 (1991), this Court upheld a trial court's refusal to allow a defense rebuttal witness to testify. Counsel for the defendant failed to disclose the witness to the State prior to trial, and in addition, the witness violated the trial court's sequestration order. With respect to the failure to disclose the witness, this Court, adopting the holding of the United States Supreme Court in Taylor v. Illinois, 484 U.S. 400, 108 S.Ct. 646, 98 L.Ed.2d 798 (1988), held in Syllabus Point 1 of Ward that,

> Where a trial court is presented with a defendant's failure to disclose the identity of witnesses in compliance with West Virginia Rule of Criminal Procedure 16, the trial court must inquire into the reasons for the defendant's failure to comply with the discovery request. If the explanation offered indicates that the omission of the witness' identity was willful and motivated by a desire to obtain a tactical advantage that would minimize the effectiveness of cross-examination and the ability to adduce rebuttal evidence, it is consistent with the purposes of the compulsory process clause of the sixth amendment to the United States Constitution and article [III], section 14 of the West Virginia Constitution to preclude the witness from testifying.

In the case sub judice, the circuit court found that the appellant had knowledge of where Mr. Barnette could be located and had failed to give the State proper notice. However, the evidence shows that Mr. Barnette was not located by the process server until the day prior to trial, and that the appellant still did not have an address or telephone number for him because he was found on the street. The only phone number the appellant had for Mr. Barnette was the one given to the State prior to trial. Evidently, by calling that phone number, the process server was able to ascertain that Mr. Barnette was in the area and eventually, he located him on the street. The State apparently did not make any further attempt to locate Mr. Barnette after calling the phone number and learning that Mr. Barnette did not live at that residence anymore.

Unlike the defendant's attorney in Ward, who knew about the witness and the content of his testimony three months prior to trial, the appellant's counsel in this case never spoke to Mr. Barnette prior to trial. However, Mr. Barnette was disclosed as a potential defense witness. In addition, when Mr.

Barnette appeared on the first day of trial, he refused to speak with the State, indicating that he probably would not have been cooperative if he had been previously located.

After reviewing all of the evidence, we are unable to conclude that the appellant's failure to disclose Mr. Barnette's location was willful or motivated by a desire to obtain tactical advantage that would minimize the effectiveness of cross-examination and the ability to adduce rebuttal evidence. The evidence shows that Mr. Barnette was essentially "homeless" and that appellant's process server only located him on the street one day prior to trial. Contrary to the circuit court's ruling, there is no evidence in the record that a mutual friend kept the appellant informed of Mr. Barnette's location. Mr. Barnette's testimony was crucial to the appellant's theory of the case, and thus, we find that the circuit court erred by refusing to allow him to testify. Accordingly, we reverse the final order of the circuit court and remand this case for a new trial.

In light of our finding that the appellant's convictions must be reversed because the circuit court erred by excluding Mr. Barnette's testimony, we need not address the remaining assignments of error. However, for the purpose of providing guidance to the circuit court upon remand, we feel compelled to examine the parties' arguments with respect to the meaning of W.Va. Code § 61-8D-3(c) (1996). This statute provides that,

> Any person who abuses a child and by the abuse creates a substantial risk of serious bodily injury or of death to the child is guilty of a felony and, upon conviction thereof, shall be fined not more than three thousand dollars and confined to the custody of the division of corrections for not less than one nor more than five years.

W.Va. Code §61-8D-3(c). W.Va. Code § 61-8D-1(1) (1988) defines "abuse" as "the infliction upon a minor of physical injury by other than accidental means."

Initially, the appellant argued that the evidence was insufficient to support his conviction because it did not show that his son had suffered an "injury" as set forth in the statute. During oral argument, the appellant's counsel conceded that under the statute, a child did not have to suffer a serious bodily injury. However, counsel argued that at least a "substantial probability" of injury was necessary. In other words, counsel asserted that the term "risk," which is not specifically defined by the statute, means "probability." In response, the State asserted that the evidence only needed to show a "substantial possibility" of injury to support a conviction under the statute.

In accordance with this Court's longstanding rules of statutory construction, "'[w]here the language of a statute is clear and without ambiguity the plain meaning is to be accepted without resorting to the rules of interpretation.' Syl. pt. 2, State v. Elder, 152 W.Va. 571, 165 S.E.2d 108 (1968)." Syllabus Point 2, Szturm v. Huntington Blizzard Hockey Associates Limited Partnership, 205 W.Va. 56, 516 S.E.2d 267 (1999). In addition, "'[a] statutory provision which is clear and unambiguous and plainly expresses the legislative intent will not be interpreted by the courts but will be given full force and effect.' Syl. Pt. 2, State v. Epperly, 135 W.Va. 877, 65 S.E.2d 488 (1951)." Syllabus Point 1, State v. Jarvis, 199 W.Va. 635, 487 S.E.2d 293 (1997). However, "[e]ach word of a statute should be given some effect and a statute must be construed in accordance with the import of its language.

Undefined words and terms used in a legislative enactment will be given their common, ordinary and accepted meaning." Syllabus Point 6, in part, State ex rel. Cohen v. Manchin, 175 W.Va. 525, 336 S.E.2d 171 (1984).

Following these rules of statutory construction, we agree with the State's conclusion that the term "risk" denotes a "possibility." The common, ordinary, and accepted meaning of the word "risk" is a "possibility of loss or injury." Webster's New Collegiate Dictionary 992 (1981). Therefore, applying this definition to the statute, we hold that the offense of child abuse creating a risk of injury as set forth in W.Va. Code § 61-8D-3(c) is committed when any person inflicts upon a minor physical injury by other than accidental means and by such action, creates a substantial possibility of serious bodily injury or death.[4]

Accordingly, for the reasons set forth above, the final order of the Circuit Court of Marion County entered on April 19, 1999, is reversed, and this case is remanded for a new trial.

Reversed and remanded.

[4]Although no instructional error was asserted in this appeal, we note that State's Instruction No. 9 occasionally omitted the words "substantial risk of serious bodily injury" as set forth in W.Va. Code § 61-8D-3(c). Upon remand, the instruction should use the full language of the statute consistent with our holding today.

Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia

Elmer STACY

No. 18063.

SYLLABUS BY THE COURT

1. At common law, trial courts assessed the admissibility of infant testimony in terms of the child's competence to testify, leaving juries to determine the credibility of the witness. In reality, with child witnesses the distinction between competency and credibility is blurred. With the adoption of W.Va. Rules of Evidence 601, which tracks its federal counterpart, the analysis of competency is replaced by a balancing of the probative value of the testimony against any unfair prejudice resulting from it under W.Va. Rules of Evidence 403. While the adoption of the W.Va. Rules of Evidence has changed the terminology of the analysis, the underlying problems of child witness testimony in sexual abuse cases remain substantially unchanged.

2. "When a child's capacity to testify that she was the victim of a sexual abuse or neglect is [in question], the court should appoint a neutral child psychologist or psychiatrist to conduct a transcribed or otherwise recorded interview." Syllabus Point 2, Burdette v. Lobban, 174 W.Va. 120, 323 S.E.2d 601 (1984).

Kendrick King, Welch, for Elmer Stacy.

Charles G. Brown, Atty. Gen., Silas Taylor, Dist. Atty. Gen., Charleston, for state.

NEELY, Justice:

Elmer Stacy was convicted by a jury on 25 July 1986, of first-degree sexual abuse for sexual contact with a five-year-old girl. Defendant is a twenty- eight-year-old of limited intelligence See footnote 1 who was invited to live in the home by the victim's parents. The state relied almost exclusively on the victim's testimony that defendant touched her between the legs (through clothing), touched her "titties," and tried to kiss her. The state's evidence included the testimony of the victim's parents that their daughter told them defendant touched her in this manner and the testimony of a physician's assistant who examined the child two days later. The physician's assistant testified that the child's hymen was intact and that there was no evidence of sperm, but that there was "quite a bit of irritation in the vaginal area." He further testified that this irritation was consistent with the alleged sexual contact, but also that there were numerous other possible causes and that he receives many complaints of such irritation from young girls, particularly during warm months.

Before the child's testimony, the court conducted an in camera competency hearing. The court and both attorneys asked the child questions to gauge her intelligence, her ability to remember and relate facts, and her understanding of the necessity to tell the truth. The defendant's counsel argued that the child should be interviewed by an independent psychiatrist or psychologist to make a determination of the child's competency before allowing her to testify in accordance with our decision in Burdette v. Lobban, 174 W.Va. 120, 323 S.E.2d 601 (1984). The trial judge overruled the defendant's motion and allowed the child to take the stand. Defendant renewed his Burdette challenge in a motion to set aside the jury verdict, which motion was denied.

On appeal, defendant assigns as error the court's ruling on the victim's competence to testify, citing Burdette. We find merit to this assignment See footnote 2 and reverse.

In Burdette, the guardian ad litem of a five-year-old child in an abuse and neglect proceeding, under W.Va. Code, 49-6-1 [1977], et seq. sought a writ of prohibition against a circuit judge who ordered that the infant be interviewed by her father's counsel outside the presence of her guardian ad litem. After ruling that the child was statutorily entitled to the presence of counsel, this Court also stated:

> Often a child in an abuse proceeding is the only potential witness. Thus, the problem confronting any court at the outset of an abuse proceeding is whether the child is competent to testify against her parents. When dealing with adult witnesses, the issues of competency and credibility are separable. These distinctions become blurred in the case of a five-year-old, however. In some situations a child may be engaging in phantasy. For example, the child may desire to 'hurt' the parent for a real or imagined grievance. In other cases, the child may be incapable of making rational judgments on his own without being unduly influenced by others. See, Note, "Lawyering for the Abused Child: You Can't Go Home Again" 29 UCLA L.Rev. 1216, at 1241-44 (1982).
> Therefore, we understand a trial court's concern to determine that a child is a competent witness before she is allowed to be the prime accuser. To do this the court should appoint a neutral child psychologist or psychiatrist to inquire into the child's capacity.

Burdette v. Lobban, 174 W.Va. 120, 122, 323 S.E.2d at 603 (1984).

The requirement for this interview by a psychiatrist or psychologist under Burdette is not mandatory, but rather subject to the sound discretion of the trial judge and the facts of the case.

At common law, competency, decided by the judge, was strictly distinguished from credibility, which was determined solely by the jury. Generally, See footnote 3 there was a rebuttable presumption against competency for children under fourteen. Many states have enacted statutes establishing a rebuttable presumption against competency for children less than ten or fourteen. See footnote 4 This presumption can be overcome by showing the child is able to receive and relate accurately and truthfully the facts in question. The latter part of this test requires that the child understands the difference between truth and falsity and comprehends the legal and moral obligation to tell the truth.

We noted in Burdette that when dealing with infant witnesses, the issues of competency and credibility are not clearly separable. As the Supreme Court of Alaska pointed out in McMaster v. State, 512 P.2d 879 (1973), a case involving a five-year-old witness:

> As a general rule it is said that th e court is the judge of a witness' s competency but that the credibility of a witness is a matter to be determined by a jury. However, competency to te stify and credibility of a witness are concepts whose boundaries merge. When a judge decides that a witness is incompetent to testify, he is stating that the witness' s ab ility to observe, to remember, to relate, or to be truthful is so im paired that his testim ony is untrustworthy. When a witness is adjudged com petent to testify, this merely means that he has some mi nimum ability to perform the four functions of a witness. It does not , however, mean that he will do so. Counsel for either party may, of course, attempt to impeach his ability to observe, remember, relate and tell the trut h in each particular case. Thus competency and credibility are concepts which weigh the same factors in evaluating a witness' s testim ony. Whether a testim onial im pairment renders a witness incompetent or merely impeaches his credibility is simply a matter of degree.

512 P.2d at 881, note 4.

The fact that the difference between competency and credibility is largely a matter of degree is inherently recognized by FRE 601 See footnote 5 which establishes a general presumption of competency for all witnesses. After our decision in Burdette, this Court adopted the West Virginia Rules of Evidence effective February 1, 1985. Rule 601, "General Rule of Competency" tracks FRE 601 and states: "Every person is competent to be a witness except as otherwise provided for by statute or these rules." In addition, West Virginia's rape shield statute, W.Va. Code, 61-8B-11(c) [1984] provides: "In any prosecution under this article, neither age nor mental capacity of the victim shall preclude the victim from testifying." A strict reading of Rule 601, W.Va. Rules of Evidence would suggest that a judge is powerless to exclude any witness on grounds of competency. However, many courts implementing the federal counterpart of our rule still leave the question of competency to the discretion of the trial judge and allow a witness to be excluded on this basis should he be incapable of telling the truth or appreciating the significance of his oath. See footnote 6

Professor Cleckley has examined the impact of Rule 601 and argues that the best approach for the trial judge is not to focus on the distinction between competency and credibility.

> "The plain m eaning of Rule 601 appear s to deprive the trial judge of any discretion whatsoever to exclude testimony on grounds of competency.... The preferable approach may be to focus the analysis not on general competency under Rule 601 but on relevancy under Rules 401 and 403."

F. Cleckley, Handbook on Evidence for West Virginia Lawyers, 2.2(B) at 28 [1986].

Rule 401, W.Va. Rules of Evidence, defines "Relevant Evidence" and Rule 403 See footnote 7 allows a trial judge discretion to exclude testimony should the danger of unfair prejudice substantially outweigh the probative value of the testimony.

With the presumption of competency established by Rule 601, we agree that the proper course is for the trial court to weigh the probative value of the evidence against the prejudice resulting from its allowance. However, the fact that Rule 601 has changed the terminology used to analyze the problem surrounding an infant's testimony does not significantly change the underlying problem.

In sexual abuse cases, it can be highly inflammatory for a jury to hear an infant speak of sexual abuse by a defendant. What juror will not tend automatically to believe a five-year-old when she says she was sexually abused? Yet to exclude the victim's testimony because of its prejudicial effect would make the prosecution of such cases nearly impossible because the victim's testimony is usually the mainstay of the state's evidence. We believe that the better course is to order an evaluation in accordance with our decision in Burdette when the balance of probative value versus prejudice of a child's testimony is a close question.

In State v. Jones, 178 W.Va. 519, 362 S.E.2d 330 (1987), we held that the trial judge did not abuse his discretion in finding a seven-year-old competent to testify against her father on a charge of first-degree sexual abuse. The crime in that case was committed in September, 1984, prior to our adoption of Rule 601. Therefore, our analysis of that case was made under the then existing common-law rules of competency.

In Jones, the witness was seven years old and understood the obligation to speak the truth on the witness stand. In addition, "She had an independent recollection of the events and understood the nature of the questions posed to her." 178 W.Va. at 521, 362 S.E.2d at 332. We cannot say in the case before us that the five-year-old witness here understood the nature of the questions posed to her.

Recently, in State v. Ayers, 179 W.Va. 365, 369 S.E.2d 22 (W.Va.1988), an appeal from a conviction of first degree sexual assault and incest, we held that the trial judge did not abuse his discretion in failing to grant defendant's motion for an independent psychiatric competency evaluation. In Ayers, the victim (H) was seven years old and was playing with her cousin when she began to cry and said that her stepfather, the defendant, had sexually assaulted her. Two days later the child was taken to the family physician who recorded her history. H stated that her stepfather attempted intercourse with her on seven occasions. She graphically detailed her stepfather's actions and stated that penetration had occurred on three occasions during the previous week.

A week later, H was hospitalized for 12 days for an adjustment disorder precipitated by her court-ordered removal from the home. She was treated by a psychiatrist who was not subpoenaed by either side, but whose records were used extensively at the in camera hearing on H's competency. The defendant called a witness with a master's degree in social work at this hearing. This witness discussed the psychiatrist's notes and then was asked by defendant's counsel if he believed the psychiatrist's report created "at least some question" of undue influence by family members that would justify an independent psychiatric evaluation of the child's competency. He stated: "[I]t would be no loss to the Court to have a second opinion to ascertain whether this child has been coached or her testimony might be valid. I see no loss whatsoever that this would not and could not be done."

The trial judge ruled that H was competent to testify, without resorting to an additional psychiatric evaluation, and we upheld his decision on appeal. In Ayers, however, the victim was seven years old, she described the sexual assault in a detailed and graphic manner, and she was examined by a psychiatrist who was not called at trial, but whose notes were extensively used at the in camera competency hearing. The defendant's own witness, in answer to a leading question, refused to say that an additional psychiatric evaluation was indicated but that it would "be no loss to have a second opinion."

In the case before us today, the victim was five years old. Two years is a significant difference when we are talking about young children. In addition, unlike the Ayers victim, this five-year-old victim was never examined by a psychiatrist. On direct examination, the child did not remember how to play the card game "war" she and defendant were playing when the incident occurred, and she did not remember a visit she received from two protective services workers. More significantly, one of her first statements on direct examination was that defendant "raped" her, although her earlier testimony was that defendant touched her between the legs through her clothing. Then, on cross-examination, the child stated that she knew what "rape" meant, but could not answer when asked to define or explain the term.

The child witness in this case also testified on cross-examination that she did not want to tell her mother of the incident because she (the victim) was "jealous," but was unable to respond coherently to counsel's questions about the meaning of the word "jealous" and her own supposed feelings of "jealousy." Clearly, this child's ability to recall events and to testify truthfully about them was put into serious question. Also, there was significant impairment of defendant's right to confront his accuser through effective cross-examination. Repeatedly, the victim was either non-responsive or responded incoherently to cross-examination. The ability to respond to questions is an inherent part of the ability to relate facts which the Alaska Court, supra, discussed as one of the four requirements for testimony to be sufficiently trustworthy to be considered admissible evidence. When a victim will testify only about the fact of abuse by a defendant, and will not effectively respond to cross- examination attempting to elicit more detail of the incident or evidence relevant to impeachment, a constitutional question of defendant's right to confront the witness against him may be raised. See footnote 8

The W.Va. Rules of Evidence are supplemented in sexual abuse cases by W.Va. Code, 61-8B-11(c) [1984] See footnote 9 which provides that neither age nor mental capacity precludes a victim of sexual abuse from testifying. Although the policy articulated in this statute is perfectly appropriate to the extent that it rectifies previous arbitrary presumptions against competency in the common law rules of evidence, W.Va. Code, 61-8B-11(c) [1984] may be required to yield if it conflicts with well-established due process constitutional rights.

Under the facts of this case, it was error for the trial judge not to grant defendant's motion for an evaluation by an independent psychiatrist in accordance with our decision in Burdette v. Lobban, and for that reason this case is reversed and remanded for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.

JUSTICE DAVIS delivered the Opinion of the Court.

SYLLABUS BY THE COURT

1. "Although conclusions of law reached by a circuit court are subject to de novo review, when an action, such as an abuse and neglect case, is tried upon the facts without a jury, the circuit court shall make a determination based upon the evidence and shall make findings of fact and conclusions of law as to whether such child is abused or neglected. These findings shall not be set aside by a reviewing court unless clearly erroneous. A finding is clearly erroneous when, although there is evidence to support the finding, the reviewing court on the entire evidence is left with the definite and firm conviction that a mistake has been committed. However, a reviewing court may not overturn a finding simply because it would have decided the case differently, and it must affirm a finding if the circuit court's account of the evidence is plausible in light of the record viewed in its entirety." Syllabus point 1, In re Tiffany Marie S., 196 W. Va. 223, 470 S.E.2d 177 (1996).

2. "Whether an incarcerated parent may attend a dispositional hearing addressing the possible termination of his or her parental rights is a matter committed to the sound discretion of the circuit court." Syllabus point 10, State ex rel. Jeanette H. v. Pancake, 207 W. Va. 154, 529 S.E.2d 865 (2000).

3. "In exercising its discretion to decide whether to permit an incarcerated parent to attend a dispositional hearing addressing the possible termination of his or her parental rights, regardless of the location of the institution wherein the parent is confined, the circuit court should balance the following factors: (1) the delay resulting from parental attendance; (2) the need for an early determination of the matter; (3) the elapsed time during which the proceeding has been pending before the circuit court; (4) the best interests of the child(ren) in reference to the parent's physical attendance at the termination hearing; (5) the reasonable availability of the parent's testimony through a means other than his or her attendance at the hearing; (6) the interests of the incarcerated parent in presenting his or her testimony in person rather than by alternate means; (7) the affect of the parent's presence and personal participation in the proceedings upon the probability of his or her ultimate success on the merits; (8) the cost and inconvenience of transporting a parent from his or her place of incarceration to the courtroom; (9) any potential danger or security risk which may accompany the incarcerated parent's transportation to or presence at the proceedings; (10) the inconvenience or detriment to parties or witnesses; and (11) any other relevant factors." Syllabus point 11, State ex rel. Jeanette H. v. Pancake, 207 W. Va. 154, 529 S.E.2d 865 (2000).

4. In order to activate the procedural protections enunciated in Syllabus points 10 and 11 of State ex rel. Jeanette H. v. Pancake, 207 W. Va. 154, 529 S.E.2d 865 (2000), an incarcerated parent who is a respondent to an abuse and neglect proceeding must inform the circuit court in which such case is pending that he/she is incarcerated and request the court's permission to attend the hearing(s) scheduled therein. Once the circuit court has been so notified, by the respondent parent individually or by the respondent parent's counsel, the determination of whether to permit the incarcerated parent to attend such hearing(s) rests in the court's sound discretion.

5. "[C]ourts are not required to exhaust every speculative possibility of parental improvement . . . where it appears that the welfare of the child will be seriously threatened, and this is particularly applicable to children under the age of three years who are more susceptible to illness, need consistent close interaction with fully committed adults, and are likely to have their emotional and physical development retarded by numerous placements." Syllabus point 1, in part, In re R.J.M., 164 W. Va. 496, 266 S.E.2d 114 (1980).

6. "The duty of a parent to support a child is a basic duty owed by the parent to the child[.]" Syllabus point 3, in part, Wyatt v. Wyatt, 185 W. Va. 472, 408 S.E.2d 51 (1991).

7. Pursuant to the plain language of W. Va. Code § 49-6-5(a)(6) (1998) (Repl. Vol. 2001), a circuit court may enter a dispositional order in an abuse and neglect case that simultaneously terminates a parent's parental rights while also requiring said parent to continue paying child support for the child(ren) subject thereto.

8. A circuit court may, in the course of modifying a previously-entered dispositional order in an abuse and neglect case in accordance with W. Va. Code § 49-6-6 (1977) (Repl. Vol. 2001), amend a parent's continuing child support obligation or the amount thereof. The court may not, however, modify said dispositional order to cancel accrued child support or decretal judgments resulting from child support arrearages.

Davis, Justice:

The appellant herein and respondent below, Robert R.[1], appeals from an order entered November 27, 2001, by the Circuit Court of Raleigh County terminating his parental rights to his minor child, Stephen Tyler R., upon a finding of abuse and neglect. Before this Court, Robert R. asserts that the circuit court erred by (1) holding the adjudicatory hearing in his absence in violation of his due process rights; (2) concluding that he had abused and/or neglected Stephen; and (3) exceeding its authority by requiring him to pay child support for Stephen after it had terminated his parental rights to this child. Upon a review of the parties' arguments, the record submitted for appellate review, and the pertinent authorities, we affirm the ruling of the circuit court. We conclude that the circuit court committed no reversible error by holding the adjudicatory hearing in Robert R.'s absence; properly found that Robert R. subjected his son, Stephen Tyler R., to the conditions of abuse and/or neglect; and acted within its statutorily-granted discretion to continue Robert R.'s support obligation following the termination of his parental rights.

[1]"In this case involving sensitive facts, we adhere to our usual practice adopted in other such cases and refer to the parties by their last initials rather than by their complete surnames." In re Emily B., 208 W. Va. 325, 329 n.1, 540 S.E.2d 542, 546 n.1 (2000) (citations omitted).

I.

FACTUAL AND PROCEDURAL HISTORY

The instant abuse and neglect proceeding commenced when the appellee herein and petitioner below, the West Virginia Department of Health and Human Resources [hereinafter referred to as "DHHR"], filed, in the Circuit Court of Raleigh County, on February 20, 2001, a petition alleging that the infant child, Stephen Tyler R.,[2] had been abused, neglected, and/or abandoned. Such allegations were based upon a purported suicide attempt by the child's mother and Mr. R.'s girlfriend, Aisha S., on January 13, 2001; Ms. S.'s alleged marijuana use; Mr. R.'s felony drug charges; and ongoing instances of domestic violence between the child's parents, Mr. R.[3] and Ms. S., which violence ultimately endangered the safety of case workers who were attempting to provide home services to prevent the removal of Stephen from his parents' home pursuant to a January 30, 2001, family treatment plan.[4] During an emergency hearing on February 20, 2001, the court deemed Stephen to be in imminent danger and placed him with Ms. S.'s grandmother, Leva V. The court further awarded supervised visitation to both parents. Following this proceeding, Ms. S. and Mr. R. waived their rights to a preliminary hearing.

[2]Stephen was born on April 2, 2000.

[3]Although Mr. R. was not listed on Stephen's birth certificate as his father, the parties do not dispute that Mr. R. is, in fact, Stephen's biological father. It is unclear from the record whether Mr. R. has submitted to a paternity test to conclusively establish this relationship.

[4]The parties initially began receiving services through DHHR in conjunction with a family treatment plan developed on August 11, 2000. This intervention by DHHR was necessitated by Ms. S.'s suicide attempt in May, 2000, and reports of domestic violence between Mr. R. and Ms. S.

An adjudicatory hearing was scheduled for April 20, 2001, and was ultimately held on June 8, 2001. Mr. R. did not appear for this hearing because he was incarcerated in Kentucky in connection with an unrelated offense.[5] At the hearing, Mr. R.'s counsel informed the court that her client was not present, but was not aware that his absence was due to his Kentucky incarceration. Despite the objections of Mr. R.'s counsel to conducting the hearing without him being present, the court proceeded with the hearing. Based upon testimony concerning various instances of domestic violence between Mr. R. and Ms. S., and, in particular, Mr. R.'s alleged beating of Ms. S. on November 19, 2000, while she was holding Stephen, the court determined that Mr. R. had abused his child. The court also found that Ms. S. had neglected her child as a result of her stipulation that Stephen had been neglected when she had exposed him to hostile situations. By orders entered July 13, 2001, the court rendered the above findings of abuse and neglect and granted Ms. S. a six-month post-adjudicatory improvement period. The court did not, however, grant Mr. R. a similar improvement period as his counsel made no such request.

[5]In May, 2001, Mr. R., while seeking employment in Kentucky, was involved in a motor vehicle accident in that State and charged with wanton endangerment, terroristic threats, and leaving the scene of an accident. The record is unclear regarding the crime(s) of which he was convicted and the length of his resultant sentence therefor.

Although Mr. R.'s dispositional hearing was scheduled for July 27, 2001, it was not held until September 12, 2001. At this hearing, the court considered and denied Mr. R.'s motion for a post-adjudicatory improvement period.[6] Counsel for Mr. R. also renewed his earlier objection that the court had conducted the adjudicatory hearing in Mr. R.'s absence. Mr. R. provided brief testimony regarding his Kentucky incarceration at the time of the adjudicatory hearing, but the court again overruled counsel's objection on this point. By order entered November 27, 2001, the circuit court terminated Mr. R.'s rights to his minor child, Stephen Tyler R., but continued his duty to support his son.[7] From these dispositions, Mr. R. appeals to this Court.[8] [6]Due to staff changes in the Raleigh County Public Defender's Office, Mr. R. was represented by one attorney at the adjudicatory hearing, and by different counsel at the dispositional hearing. It appears that counsel who represented Mr. R. at the dispositional hearing did not file a motion for a post-adjudicatory improvement period until September 6, 2001, approximately one week before said hearing.

[7]The circuit court did not, however, terminate Ms. S.'s parental rights to Stephen. Rather, the court continued the six-month post-adjudicatory improvement period it had granted her following the June 8, 2001, adjudicatory hearing. Since the court's disposition of this matter, though, DHHR has moved the court to discontinue Ms. S.'s improvement period and to terminate her parental rights, as well. In any event, Ms. S. is not a party to the instant appellate proceeding.

[8]On January 25, 2002, the circuit court extended the time within which Mr. R. was required to file his petition for appeal to permit for the preparation and acquisition of transcripts of the proceedings had in this matter.

STANDARD OF REVIEW

Procedurally, this matter comes before us as an appeal from the lower court's conclusion that the subject child was abused and/or neglected and its corresponding determination that his best interests necessitated the termination of his father's parental rights. In appeals of abuse and neglect cases, such as the instant proceeding, we apply a compound standard of review.

> Although conclusions of law reached by a circuit court are subject to de novo review, when an action, such as an abuse and neglect case, is tried upon the facts without a jury, the circuit court shall make a determination based upon the evidence and shall make findings of fact and conclusions of law as to whether such child is abused or neglected. These findings shall not be set aside by a reviewing court unless clearly erroneous. A finding is clearly erroneous when, although there is evidence to support the finding, the reviewing court on the entire evidence is left with the definite and firm conviction that a mistake has been committed. However, a reviewing court may not overturn a finding simply because it would have decided the case differently, and it must affirm a finding if the circuit court's account of the evidence is plausible in light of the record viewed in its entirety.

Syl. pt. 1, In re Tiffany Marie S., 196 W. Va. 223, 470 S.E.2d 177 (1996). With this standard in mind, we proceed to consider the parties' arguments.

III.

DISCUSSION

On appeal to this Court, Mr. R. raises three assignments of error, arguing that the circuit court erred by (1) holding the adjudicatory hearing in his absence in violation of his due process rights; (2) concluding that he had abused and/or neglected his son; and (3) exceeding its authority by requiring him to pay child support for Stephen after it had terminated his parental rights to his child.

A. Due Process

Mr. R. first contends that he was denied his right to due process when the circuit court conducted the adjudicatory hearing in his absence. In the proceedings underlying the instant appeal, an adjudication of whether Mr. R. had abused and/or neglected Stephen was initially scheduled to be held on April 20, 2001. This hearing did not take place, however, until June 8, 2001. At the appointed hearing time, Mr. R. was absent from the proceedings, and neither the circuit court nor his counsel knew of his whereabouts, although Mr. R.'s counsel did object to the conduction of the hearing in her client's absence. Mr. R. represents that he was absent from this proceeding because he was being held in the Pike County, Kentucky, jail incident to a traffic arrest. Additionally, Mr. R. claims that he wrote a letter to the presiding judge in Pike County, Kentucky, to request leniency so that he could participate in the Raleigh County, West Virginia, abuse and neglect proceedings regarding Stephen. Nevertheless, there is no indication from the record that Mr. R. similarly attempted to notify either the circuit court or his counsel about his Kentucky confinement. On appeal to this Court, Mr. R. claims that the circuit court's decision to hold the adjudicatory hearing in his absence violated his due process right to participate therein, specifically his opportunity to be heard and to cross-examine witnesses.

Although we previously have recognized that an incarcerated parent may participate in an abuse and neglect proceeding, this right is conditional, not automatic, and subject to many limitations.

> Whether an incarcerated parent may attend a dispositional hearing addressing the possible termination of his or her parental rights is a matter committed to the sound discretion of the circuit court.
> In exercising its discretion to decide whether to permit an incarcerated parent to attend a dispositional hearing addressing the possible termination of his or her parental rights, regardless of the location of the institution wherein the parent is confined, the circuit court should balance the following factors: (1) the delay resulting from parental attendance; (2) the need for an early determination of the matter; (3) the elapsed time during which the proceeding has been pending before the circuit court; (4) the best interests of the child(ren) in reference to the parent's physical attendance at the termination hearing; (5) the reasonable availability of the parent's testimony through a means other than his or her attendance at the hearing; (6) the interests of the incarcerated parent in presenting his or her testimony in person rather than by alternate means; (7) the affect of the parent's presence and personal participation in the proceedings upon the probability of his or her ultimate success on the merits; (8) the cost and inconvenience of transporting a parent from his or her place of > incarceration to the courtroom; (9) any potential danger or security risk which may accompany the incarcerated parent's transportation to or presence at the proceedings; (10) the inconvenience or detriment to parties or witnesses; and (11) any other relevant factors.

Syl. pts. 10-11, State ex rel. Jeanette H. v. Pancake, 207 W. Va. 154, 529 S.E.2d 865 (2000). In the case sub judice, the circuit court did not consider whether Mr. R. should be permitted to participate in the adjudicatory hearing or whether such proceeding should be continued until his presence could be secured because, in short, the circuit court did not know that the reason for Mr. R.'s absence was his Kentucky incarceration. While we do not treat lightly an individual's right to receive the process which he/she is constitutionally due, we similarly do not expect our circuit court judges to serve as omnipotent soothsayers who can foretell the location of any party who is absent from proceedings held in their courtrooms.

When constitutionally-protected rights are involved in a particular case, we frequently have found that the party entitled to the protections thereof can also effectuate a forfeiture or waiver of such safeguards. See, e.g., State ex rel. Miller v. Reed, 203 W. Va. 673, 682, 510 S.E.2d 507, 516 (1998) (concluding that "[t]he failure of respondents . . . to request an administrative hearing within the time provided by statute constituted a waiver of their right to do so and their [driver's] licenses were properly revoked"); State v. Crabtree, 198 W. Va. 620, 629, 482 S.E.2d 605, 614 (1996) (observing that a criminal defendant's right to be present at all critical stages of a criminal proceeding "is not absolute and can be waived by the voluntary action of the defendant" (citation omitted)); Syl. pt. 1, State v. Crouch, 178 W. Va. 221, 358 S.E.2d 782 (1987) ("For a recantation of a request for counsel to be effective: (1) the accused must initiate a conversation; and (2) must knowingly and intelligently, under the totality of the circumstances, waive his right to counsel."); State ex rel. Arbogast v. Mohn, 164 W. Va. 6, 13-14, 260 S.E.2d 820, 824-25 (1979) (recognizing that, when criminal penalties for offense are modified by Legislature, criminal defendant may waive right to elect under which statute he/she wishes to be sentenced); Syl. pt. 1, State v. McArdle, 156 W. Va. 409, 194 S.E.2d 174 (1973) ("Since waiver of juvenile jurisdiction is a critical stage in criminal proceedings against a juvenile, constitutional due process demands that the child, his parents and his counsel be afforded reasonable notice of the waiver hearing, the charge to be considered, a reasonable opportunity to prepare a defense to such waiver and a meaningful hearing at which evidence on behalf of the juvenile should be permitted."). Accord Dusanek v. Hannon, 677 F.2d 538, 542-43 (7th Cir. 1982) ("The availability of recourse to a constitutionally sufficient administrative procedure satisfies due process requirements if the complainant merely declines or fails to take advantage of the administrative procedure." (citations omitted)). See also United States v. Tipton, 90 F.3d 861, 872-76 (4th Cir. 1996) (distinguishing between waiver of right and forfeiture of right resulting from failure to timely assert entitlement thereto). But see, e.g., Abshire v. Cline, 193 W. Va. 180, 455 S.E.2d 549 (1995) (refusing to find motorist had waived due process right to administrative hearing where neither attorney nor respondent was responsible for untimely request for continuance).

This is particularly true where, as in the instant matter, the process that is due varies with the circumstances of the party seeking the protections thereof. For example, when a respondent parent to an abuse and neglect proceeding is incarcerated, additional procedural safeguards must be considered to ascertain whether he/she may physically participate in the attendant proceedings, whereas such concerns generally are not at issue when the respondent parent has not been confined. See generally Jeanette H., 207 W. Va. 154, 529 S.E.2d 865. Accord In re Emily B., 208 W. Va. 325, 331 n.11, 540 S.E.2d 542, 548 n.11 (2000). Nevertheless, when such protective measures are in place, "'a state cannot be held to have violated due process requirements when it made procedural protection[s] available and the [complaining party] has simply refused to avail himself of them.'" Heston v. Marion County Parks & Recreation Comm'n, 181 W. Va. 138, 143 n.6, 381 S.E.2d 253, 258 n.6 (1989) (per curiam) (quoting Dusanek v. Hannon, 677 F.2d at 543) (additional citations omitted).

In the proceedings underlying the instant appeal, Mr. R. was entitled to have the circuit court consider whether he could be released from his Kentucky incarceration for the limited purpose of attending the West Virginia adjudicatory hearing regarding Stephen. See Syl. pts. 10-11, Jeanette H., 207 W. Va. 154, 529 S.E.2d 865. Our holding in this regard, though, presupposes that the presiding circuit court has knowledge of said respondent parent's confinement through the communication of such fact by either the parent, him/herself, or the parent's attorney.[9] See, e.g., id., 207 W. Va. at 159, 529 S.E.2d at 870 (discussing proposed order Jeanette sent to Cabell County Circuit Court "directing her transportation from the McDowell County Jail so that she might attend the [Cabell County abuse and neglect] proceedings"). Given that the preeminent concern in abuse and neglect proceedings is the best interests of the child(ren) subject thereto[10] and the speedy resolution thereof[11], it seems unduly burdensome to require circuit courts to conduct an inquiry as to the whereabouts of every respondent parent who fails to appear for a scheduled hearing in order to ascertain whether their absence is attributable to incarceration and whether, as a result of such confinement, they should be afforded further procedural protections attendant thereto.

Rather, we find that the better course is to require the party seeking the benefit of additional safeguards to affirmatively notify the presiding tribunal of the facts which may require the court to invoke such protective measures.[12] Such a procedure will thus adequately protect the respondent parent's interests in his/her parental rights to his/her child(ren)[13] without hindering the overwhelming policy of resolving abuse and [12]We have recognized a similar duty to exist in administrative proceedings wherein we have required an aggrieved party who wishes to benefit from certain procedural protections to alert the presiding tribunal as to their applicability. See, e.g., Syl. pt. 4, Hanlon v. Logan County Bd. of Educ., 201 W. Va. 305, 496 S.E.2d 447 (1997) ("In order to benefit from the 'relief by default' provisions contained in W. Va. Code § 18-29-3(a) (1992) (Repl. Harpers Ferry Police Civil Serv. Comm'n*, 209 W. Va. 83, 88 n.13, 543 S.E.2d 364, 369 n.13 (2001) ("recommend[ing] that future civil service officers observe basic concepts of fairness and judicial economy by timely filing a request [for a pre-termination hearing] when their employers fail to honor their statutory rights" (citation omitted)).

neglect matters promptly in order to secure the subject child(ren)'s safety and well-being.[14] Accordingly, we hold that, in order to activate the procedural protections enunciated in Syllabus points 10 and 11 of State ex rel. Jeanette H. v. Pancake, 207 W. Va. 154, 529 S.E.2d 865 (2000), an incarcerated parent who is a respondent to an abuse and neglect proceeding must inform the circuit court in which such case is pending that he/she is incarcerated and request the court's permission to attend the hearing(s) scheduled therein. Once the circuit court has been so notified, by the respondent parent individually or by the respondent parent's counsel, the determination of whether to permit the incarcerated parent to attend such hearing(s) rests in the court's sound discretion.

It is undisputed that Mr. R. received notice of the adjudicatory hearing at issue in this assignment of error, and that, in spite of his absence therefrom, he was represented by counsel at that hearing.[15] However, during the proceedings underlying the instant appeal, Mr. R. failed to notify either the Circuit Court of Raleigh County or his counsel that he would be absent from the adjudicatory hearing because he was legal custody of his child, without notice and the opportunity for a meaningful hearing."); Syl. pt. 4, In re Sutton, 132 W. Va. 875, 53 S.E.2d 839 (1949) ("A parent having legal custody of his child (Acts of the Legislature, 1941, Chapter 73, Article 6, Section 2) cannot be divested of parental rights without notice and an opportunity for hearing.").

[15]Additionally, counsel for Mr. R. objected to the hearing proceeding in her client's absence, and presented evidence and cross-examined witnesses on Mr. R.'s behalf.

incarcerated in Kentucky. Neither does the record evidence a request by Mr. R. that the Raleigh County proceedings be continued until a determination had been made as to whether he could be released from confinement for the limited purpose of attending and participating in the adjudicatory hearing. In the absence of even the slightest communication of this fact to the presiding tribunal or his legal representative, we are reluctant to find that Mr. R. acted to invoke the safeguards necessary to protect his due process rights in this regard. Moreover, further postponement of the adjudicatory hearing, without knowledge of Mr. R.'s confinement and the attendant analysis provided by Jeanette H., would have been improper considering the fact that this hearing had already been continued from April 20, 2001, until June 8, 2001, and the overriding concern that abuse and neglect matters should be promptly resolved.[16] See W. Va. R. Proc. for Child Abuse & Neglect Proceed. 7 (requiring good cause be shown for continuance of proceedings). Accordingly, we affirm the circuit court's decision to hold the adjudicatory hearing in Mr. R.'s absence and its resultant ruling.

[16]See supra note 11 and accompanying text.

B. Findings of Abuse and/or Neglect

For his second assignment of error, Mr. R. complains that the circuit court improperly found that he had abused and/or neglected his son, Stephen, and concluded that he was not likely to substantially correct such conditions of abuse and/or neglect.[17] In this regard, Mr. R. asserts that the allegations against him, that he had allegedly battered Ms.

[17]Additionally, Mr. R. complains that the circuit court did not timely enter the dispositional order in this case as required by Rule 36 of the West Virginia Rules of Procedure for Child Abuse and Neglect Proceedings. See W. Va. R. Proc. for Child Abuse & Neglect Proceed. 36(a) ("At the conclusion of the disposition hearing, the court shall make findings of fact and conclusions of law, in writing or on the record, as to the appropriate disposition in accordance with the provisions of W. Va. Code § 49-6-5. The court shall enter a disposition order, including findings of fact and conclusions of law, within ten (10) days of the conclusion of the hearing." (emphasis added)). In support of this argument, Mr. R. represents that the order was required to be entered within ten days of the September 12, 2001, dispositional hearing, but was in fact entered on November 27, 2001, which was approximately two and one-half months after the hearing date. While we agree with Mr. R.'s interpretation of this procedural rule, we do not find that the circuit court's delay in entering its order constitutes reversible error.

> We previously have held that
> > [w]here it appears from the record that the process established by the Rules of Procedure for Chid Abuse and Neglect Proceedings and related statutes for the disposition of cases involving children adjudicated to be abused or neglected has been substantially disregarded or frustrated, the resulting order of disposition will be vacated and the case remanded for compliance with that process and entry of an appropriate dispositional order.

Syl. pt. 5, In re Edward B., 210 W. Va. 621, 558 S.E.2d 620 (2001). Although we find that the temporal requirements for the entry of a dispositional order were not satisfied in this case, such error is harmless as the delay did not substantially frustrate the purpose of such procedural rules. See W. Va. R. Proc. for Child Abuse & Neglect Proceed. 2 ("These rules shall be liberally construed to achieve safe, stable, secure permanent homes for abused and/or neglected children and fairness to all litigants. These rules are not to be applied or enforced in any manner which will endanger or harm a child. . . ."). Nevertheless, we admonish courts in which abuse and neglect cases are pending to be ever vigilant and mindful of the procedural rules governing such proceedings in order that the purpose thereof not be defeated.

S. in Stephen's presence and that he was using marijuana during the case worker's February 14, 2001, visit to his home do not constitute abuse and/or neglect as those terms are defined by the governing statute. Citing W. Va. Code § 49-1-3 (1999) (Repl. Vol. 2001). Mr. R. also suggests that DHHR failed to adhere to its statutory duty to make every reasonable effort to reunite and preserve the family unit. Citing W. Va. Code § 49-6-12(i) (1996) (Repl. Vol. 2001) (charging DHHR with responsibility of "mak[ing] reasonable efforts to reunify [the] family"); W. Va. Code § 49-6D-2(a)(2) (1984) (Repl. Vol. 2001) (recognizing purposes of chapter as including duty of State to "preserve and strengthen the family ties wherever possible, while recognizing both the fundamental rights of parenthood and the State's responsibility to assist the family"); State ex rel. W. Va. Dep't of Human Servs. v. Cheryl M., 177 W. Va. 688, 356 S.E.2d 181 (1987). Responding to Mr. R.'s contentions, DHHR asserts that the circuit court properly found Stephen to be an abused and/or neglected child.

At issue in this assignment of error is whether the evidence presented to the circuit court supports a finding that Mr. R. had abused and/or neglected his son. W. Va. Code § 49-1-3 (1999) (Repl. Vol. 2001) enumerates the criteria for making such a determination:

another person to inflict, physical injury or mental or emotional injury, upon the child or another child in the home; or

(2) Sexual abuse or sexual exploitation; or

(3) The sale or attempted sale of a child by a parent, guardian or custodian in violation of section sixteen [§ 48-4-16], article four, chapter forty-eight of this code.

In addition to its broader meaning, physical injury may include an injury to the child as a result of excessive corporal punishment.

(c) "Child abuse and neglect" or "child abuse or neglect" means physical injury, mental or emotional injury, sexual abuse, sexual exploitation, sale or attempted sale or negligent treatment or maltreatment of a child by a parent, guardian or custodian who is responsible for the child's welfare, under circumstances which harm or threaten the health and welfare of the child.

(h) (1) "Neglected child" means a child:

(A) Whose physical or mental health is harmed or threatened by a present refusal, failure or inability of the child's parent, guardian or custodian to supply the child with necessary food, clothing, shelter, supervision, medical care or education, when such refusal, failure or inability is not due primarily to a lack of financial means on the part of the parent, guardian or custodian; or

(B) Who is presently without necessary food, clothing, shelter, medical care, education or supervision because of the disappearance or absence of the child's parent or custodian;

(2) "Neglected child" does not mean a child whose > education is conducted within the provisions of section one [§ 18-8-1], article eight, chapter eighteen of this code.

In evaluating the evidence presented on the issue of a child's abuse and/or neglect, > the court shall consider the efforts of the state department to remedy the alleged circumstances. At the conclusion of the hearing the court shall make a determination based upon the evidence and shall make findings of fact and conclusions of law as to whether such child is abused or neglected, which shall be incorporated into the order of the court. The findings must be based upon conditions existing at the time of the filing of the petition and proven by clear and convincing proof.

W. Va. Code § 49-6-2(c) (1996) (Repl. Vol. 2001).

Where, however, the court makes > a finding that there is no reasonable likelihood that the conditions of neglect or abuse can be substantially corrected in the near future, and when necessary for the welfare of the child, [the court shall] terminate the parental, custodial or guardianship rights and/or responsibilities of the abusing parent and commit the child to the permanent sole custody of the nonabusing parent, if there be one, or, if not, to either the permanent guardianship of the department or a licensed child welfare agency.

W. Va. Code § 49-6-5(b).

During the proceedings underlying the instant appeal, the circuit court considered the evidence presented on behalf of Mr. R. as well as that submitted by DHHR. The court ultimately determined, by adjudicatory order entered July 13, 2001, that Mr. R. had abused and/or neglected Stephen and rendered findings of fact evidencing this conclusion:

> The continued residence of the infant child in the home and in the care and custody by the Respondent Father is contrary to the best interest of the child for reasons stated herein.
> That the danger presented by the infant child's present circumstances creates an emergency situation making efforts > to avoid removing the child from the home unreasonable or impossible;

>
> That there are no reasonable, available, and less drastic alternatives to removing the child from custody by the Respondent Father;
>
> . . . .
>
> That the conduct of the respondent father's violence toward the respondent mother has been more than one time and at least once in the presence of the infant child;
>
> That the November 19, 2000, incident was a planned methodical beating in the presence of the infant child without regard for the infant child nor the respondent mother's welfare;
>
> That [the] evidence supports the fact that the respondent father has subjected the infant child to abuse and/or neglect, therefore the respondent father has abused and neglected the infant child in respect to his conduct;

Based upon these findings, and the additional record evidence of Mr. R.'s repeated unwillingness to cooperate in the development and execution of a family case plan, we do not conclude that the circuit court erred by determining that Mr. R. had abused and/or neglected his son. Perhaps the most disturbing evidence of such abuse is the incident referenced in the circuit court's findings in which Mr. R. not only battered Ms. S., but did so while she was holding Stephen, who was then only seven months old, in her arms. See W. Va. Code § 48-27-101(a)(2) (2001) (Repl. Vol. 2001) (recognizing that

"[c]hildren . . . [who] witness violence against one of their parents . . . . may suffer deep and lasting emotional harm . . . from [such] exposure to domestic violence"); Syl. pt. 8, in part, In re Carlita B., 185 W. Va. 613, 408 S.E.2d 365 (1991) ("Prior acts of violence, physical abuse, or emotional abuse . . . are relevant in a termination of parental rights proceeding[.]"). See also Nancy Viola R. v. Randolph W., 177 W. Va. 710, 714, 356 S.E.2d 464, 468 (1987) ("[S]pousal abuse is a factor to be considered in determining parental fitness for child custody." (citation omitted)); Collins v. Collins, 171 W. Va. 126, 297 S.E.2d 901 (1982) (per curiam) (finding that child's mother who had committed acts of domestic violence was unfit custodian for child). Additional record evidence indicated that Mr. R. used marijuana in his son's presence, which can also support a finding of abuse and neglect. See, e.g., In re Aaron Thomas M., 212 W. Va. 604, 609, 575 S.E.2d 214, 219 (2002) (per curiam) (upholding circuit court's finding that "children were emotionally abused by [mother's] repeated drug use in their presence"). Finding no reversible error, we affirm the circuit court's finding that Mr. R. had abused and/or neglected Stephen.

Furthermore, the record is replete with testimony from Mr. R., himself, as well as from professionals who have examined him, indicating that he does not believe he should undergo therapy to manage his anger and evidencing his unwillingness to cooperate in family case plans designed to improve the stability of the family structure in order to provide a safe and suitable home environment for Stephen. Not only does this lack of cooperation delay the correction of the problems initially identified by DHHR in its petition for abuse and/or neglect as being harmful to Stephen, but such blatant refusal to participate in these plans, in and of itself, suggests that an improvement period would be highly unsuccessful and constitutes grounds for termination of parental rights. See, e.g., W. Va. Code §§ 49-6-5(b)(2-3) (stating that "no reasonable likelihood that conditions of neglect or abuse can be substantially corrected" is deemed to exist when the abusing parent refuses to cooperate in the development of a family case plan or has not complied with said family case plan or other rehabilitative services designed to correct such conditions of abuse and/or neglect). Cf. State ex rel. Virginia M. v. Virgil Eugene S. II, 197 W. Va. 456, 461, 475 S.E.2d 548, 553 (1996) (per curiam) (indicating that "one instance of alleged abuse . . . . does not constitute the 'compelling circumstances' sufficient to deny the natural mother . . . any chance for rehabilitation" and, thus, granting mother improvement period).

Additionally, DHHR presented evidence that, during its lengthy involvement with this family, Mr. R. has failed to attend scheduled visitations with Stephen provided by various voluntary family treatment plans. This evidence also suggests that an improvement period is not warranted in this case. See In re Carlita B., 185 W. Va. at 628, 408 S.E.2d at 380 ("A parent's level of interest in visiting with his or her child during an out-of-home improvement period is an extremely significant factor for the circuit court to review."). In sum, > of parental improvement . . . where it appears that the welfare of the child will be seriously threatened, and this is particularly applicable to children under the age of three years who are more susceptible to illness, need consistent close interaction with fully committed adults, and are likely to have their emotional and physical development retarded by numerous placements.

Syl. pt. 1, in part, In re R.J.M., 164 W. Va. 496, 266 S.E.2d 114. See also W. Va. Code § 49-6-12 (1996) (Repl. Vol. 2001) (conditioning grant of improvement periods, at all stages of abuse and neglect proceedings, upon clear and convincing evidence that parent will fully participate therein). Based upon the circuit court's findings and the record evidence in this case, we find that Mr. R. was not likely to substantially correct the conditions of abuse and/or neglect with which he had been charged and that granting him an improvement period would have been a futile gesture. Finding that the circuit court did not commit reversible error by denying Mr. R. an improvement period, we affirm the court's ruling in this regard.

C. Continuing Duty to Support Child after Termination of Parental Rights

Lastly, Mr. R. argues that the circuit court erred by continuing his obligation to pay child support for Stephen even though it terminated his parental rights to this child. In rendering its dispositional ruling in this matter, the circuit court ordered "[t]hat it is in the best interest of the infant child that the parental rights of Robert [R.] are hereby TERMINATED and forever gone as to the infant child, Stephen Tyler [R.], but for his duty to pay child support for said infant child." (Emphasis added). On appeal to this Court,

Mr. R. complains that the circuit court's ruling is fundamentally unfair because he no longer has the right to visit with his son. He further suggests that future inequities could occur if he is required to pay child support and someone ultimately adopts Stephen; under this scenario, Mr. R. argues that the adoptive parent could then enjoy the rights and benefits of parenthood without also having to pay for Stephen's support and maintenance. Finally, Mr. R. asserts that a continuing duty of support is inconsistent with the complete severance of parental rights and the cessation of contact between the child and such parent. Citing W. Va. Code § 49-1-3(o) (defining "parental rights" as "any and all rights and duties regarding a parent to a minor child, including, but not limited to, custodial rights and visitational rights and rights to participate in the decisions affecting a minor child"). By contrast, DHHR contends that the circuit court did not abuse its discretion by ordering Mr. R. to pay child support for Stephen after it terminated his parental rights because a parent is obligated to support his or her child. Citing Wyatt v. Wyatt, 185 W. Va. 472, 408 S.E.2d 51 (1991). Moreover, DHHR states that the circuit court's ultimate disposition in abuse and neglect proceedings is discretionary, and may include the termination of parental rights and/or responsibilities. Citing W. Va. Code § 49-6-5(a)(6).

W. Va. Code § 49-6-5 (1998) (Repl. Vol. 2001) is the statutory provision that governs final dispositions in abuse and neglect proceedings. Pursuant to its terms,

> (1) Dismiss the petition;
> (2) Refer the child, the abusing parent, or other family members to a community agency for needed assistance and dismiss the petition;
> (3) Return the child to his or her own home under supervision of the department;
> (4) Order terms of supervision calculated to assist the child and any abusing parent or parents or custodian which prescribe the manner of supervision and care of the child and which are within the ability of any parent or parents or custodian to perform;
>
> (5) Upon a finding that the abusing parent or parents are presently unwilling or unable to provide adequately for the child's needs, commit the child temporarily to the custody of the state department, a licensed private child welfare agency or a suitable person who may be appointed guardian by the court. . . . The court order shall also determine under what circumstances the child's commitment to the department shall continue. . . . The court may order services to meet the special needs of the child. Whenever the court transfers custody of a youth to the department, an appropriate order of financial support by the parents or guardians shall be entered in accordance with section five [§ 49-7-5], article seven of this chapter; or
> (6) Upon a finding that there is no reasonable likelihood that the conditions of neglect or abuse can be substantially corrected in the near future, and when necessary for the welfare of the child, terminate the parental, custodial or guardianship rights and/or responsibilities of the abusing parent and commit the child to the permanent sole custody of the nonabusing parent, if there be one, or, if not, to either the permanent guardianship of the department or a licensed child welfare agency[.]

W. Va. Code §§ 49-6-5(a)(1-6). Cf. W. Va. Code § 49-6-5b (1998) (Repl. Vol. 2001)

(delineating circumstances in which circuit court is required to terminate parental rights). It is the most drastic of these alternatives, the complete termination of a parent's parental rights to his/her child(ren), to which the court resorted in the case sub judice and from which Mr. R. now appeals. Thus, we must now consider whether the applicable statutory provision, W. Va. Code § 49-6-5(a)(6), permits a circuit court to terminate a parent's parental rights while continuing his/her obligation to pay child support for the child to which his/her rights have been terminated.

When called upon to discern the meaning of a legislative enactment, this Court resorts to well-accepted rules of statutory construction. "The primary object in construing a statute is to ascertain and give effect to the intent of the Legislature." Syl. pt. 1, Smith v. State Workmen's Comp. Comm'r, 159 W. Va. 108, 219 S.E.2d 361 (1975). In order to determine this legislative intent, we must consider the precise language employed by the Legislature in promulgating the statutory provision enactment at issue. "Where the language of a statute is clear and without ambiguity the plain meaning is to be accepted without resorting to the rules of interpretation." Syl. pt. 2, State v. Elder, 152 W. Va. 571, 165 S.E.2d 108 (1968). Accord Syl. pt. 1, State v. Jarvis, 199 W. Va. 635, 487 S.E.2d 293 (1997) ("'A statutory provision which is clear and unambiguous and plainly expresses the legislative intent will not be interpreted by the courts but will be given full force and effect.' Syl. Pt. 2, State v. Epperly, 135 W. Va. 877, 65 S.E.2d 488 (1951)."); State ex rel. Roy Allen S. v. Stone, 196 W. Va. 624, 630, 474 S.E.2d 554, 560

(1996) ("We look first to the statute's language. If the text, given its plain meaning, answers the interpretive question, the language must prevail and further inquiry is foreclosed." (internal quotations and citation omitted) (footnote omitted)).

Turning now to the case sub judice, the specific statutory provision upon which the circuit court relied in rendering its disposition is subsection (a)(6) of W. Va. Code § 49-6-5. This language provides, in pertinent part,

> [u]pon a finding that there is no reasonable likelihood that the conditions of neglect or abuse can be substantially corrected in the near future, and when necessary for the welfare of the child, terminate the parental, custodial or guardianship rights and/or responsibilities of the abusing parent and commit the child to the permanent sole custody of the nonabusing parent, if there be one, or, if not, to either the permanent guardianship of the department or a licensed child welfare agency[.]

W. Va. Code § 49-6-5(a)(6) (emphasis added). The plain language of this statute affords the circuit court the options of either terminating the abusing parent's parental rights, terminating his/her responsibilities, or terminating both the parent's parental rights and responsibilities. See id. "Parental rights" are defined by the Legislature to "mean[] any and all rights and duties regarding a parent to a minor child, including, but not limited to, custodial rights and visitational rights and rights to participate in the decisions affecting a minor child." W. Va. Code § 49-1-3(o). However, the "responsibilities" to which W. Va. Code § 49-6-5(a)(6) refers have not been so defined.

Where, as here, a word employed in a statute is not specifically defined by the Legislature, we resort to the commonly accepted usage of that term. "Each word of a statute should be given some effect and a statute must be construed in accordance with the import of its language. Undefined words and terms used in a legislative enactment will be given their common, ordinary and accepted meaning." Syl. pt. 6, in part, State ex rel. Cohen v. Manchin, 175 W. Va. 525, 336 S.E.2d 171 (1984). Accord Syl. pt. 4, State v. General Daniel Morgan Post No. 548, V.F.W., 144 W. Va. 137, 107 S.E.2d 353 (1959) ("Generally the words of a statute are to be given their ordinary and familiar significance and meaning, and regard is to be had for their general and proper use."). Our inquiry, then, is whether the realm of parental responsibilities referenced in W. Va. Code § 49-6-5(a)(6) contemplates the obligation of child support.

A parent's duty to support his/her child(ren) has long been recognized to be an integral part of the rubric of parental responsibilities. "The duty of a parent to support a child is a basic duty owed by the parent to the child[.]" Syl. pt. 3, in part, Wyatt v. Wyatt, 185 W. Va. 472, 408 S.E.2d 51 (1991). Stated otherwise, "[p]rovision of shelter and financial support for children is one of the most basic components of parental responsibility." In re Jamie Nicole H., 205 W. Va. 176, 183, 517 S.E.2d 41, 48 (1999).

The Legislature, too, has recognized the extreme importance of providing support for one's own child(ren). "It is the intent of the Legislature that to the extent practicable, the laws of this state should encourage and require a child's parents to meet the obligation of providing that child with adequate food, shelter, clothing, education, and health and child care." W. Va. Code § 48-11-101(a) (2001) (Repl. Vol. 2001). Such an "obligation of child support is grounded in the moral and legal duty of support of one's children from the time of birth." Supcoe v. Shearer, 204 W. Va. 326, 330, 512 S.E.2d 583, 587 (1998) (per curiam). In fact, the duty of support is recognized as being so inherently a parental responsibility that a parent who fails to fulfill this obligation can be sanctioned with criminal penalties. See W. Va. Code § 61-5-29 (1999) (Repl. Vol. 2000) (enumerating elements for crime of "[f]ailure to meet an obligation to provide support to a minor" and establishing penalties therefor).[19] Accord 18 U.S.C. § 228 (1998) (2000 ed.) 18 U.S.C. § 228 (1998) (2000 ed.).

("The State has a broad role in the enforcement of child support[.]"). Thus, it goes without saying that the responsibilities contemplated by W. Va. Code § 49-6-5(a)(6) most certainly include the obligation to pay child support. Accordingly, we hold that, pursuant to the plain language of W. Va. Code § 49-6-5(a)(6) (1998) (Repl. Vol. 2001), a circuit court may enter a dispositional order in an abuse and neglect case that simultaneously terminates a parent's parental rights while also requiring said parent to continue paying child support for the child(ren) subject thereto.[21]

Applying this statutory construction to the case sub judice, we find that the circuit court did not err by both terminating Mr. R.'s parental rights and continuing his obligation to support Stephen as such disposition was clearly authorized by W. Va. Code § 49-6-5(a)(6). In presenting his arguments on this point to the Court, however, Mr. R. has raised several legitimate concerns which already have been adequately addressed by coordinate statutory provisions but which nevertheless warrant clarification herein.

The first such contention raised by Mr. R. is his assertion that the circuit court's decision to continue his support obligation is patently unfair when he no longer has [21]It should be noted, however, that this holding is limited to those cases involving child support obligations in abuse and neglect proceedings. Thus, based upon the narrow scope of the governing statute, W. Va. Code § 49-6-5(a)(6), our decision herein should not be construed as determinative of the propriety, or impropriety, of child support awards in other contexts. See Rebecca Lynn C. v. Michael Joseph B., ___ W. Va. ___, ___, ___ S.E.2d ___, ___, slip op. at 5 n.4 (No. 30411 July 1, 2003) (per curiam).

the right to visit or otherwise have contact with his son. We begin by reiterating our earlier observation to the effect that "the duty to pay child support and the right to exercise visitation are not interdependent." Carter v. Carter, 198 W. Va. 171, 177, 479 S.E.2d 681, 687 (1996). Moreover, our decision herein is consistent with the Legislature's intended disposition of abuse and neglect cases. Under W. Va. Code § 49-6-5(a)(6), discussed above, the presiding circuit court is granted the authority to choose between the alternatives of terminating parental rights and/or parental responsibilities to achieve the result appropriate in a particular case. However, the dispositional alternative enumerated in W. Va. Code § 49-6-5(a)(5) specifically commands the court selecting this disposition to enter "an appropriate order of financial support by the parents or guardians" even though this alternative also entails the temporary transfer of custody of the subject child(ren) to a guardian other than the child(ren)'s parents. See also W. Va. Code § 49-7-5 (1936) (Repl. Vol. 2001) (ordering "person [who is] legally liable for the support of [a] child [who has been placed in home, institution, or under guardianship] [and who] is able to contribute to the support of such child . . . to pay . . . a reasonable sum from time to time for the support, maintenance, and education of the child").

This emphasis on the child(ren)'s right to receive support, rather than on his/her parent's right to retain custody or visitation privileges, is based on the fact that "child support payments are exclusively for the benefit and economic best interest of the child." Carter v. Carter, 198 W. Va. at 176, 479 S.E.2d at 686 (citations omitted). Accord Supcoe v. Shearer, 204 W. Va. at 330, 512 S.E.2d at 587 ("[C]hild support is for the benefit of the child[.]"); Lang v. Iams, 201 W. Va. 24, 28, 491 S.E.2d 24, 28 (1997) (per curiam) ("An initial child support order is entered for the benefit of the child or children involved."). See also Carter, 198 W. Va. at 176, 479 S.E.2d at 686 ("A fundamental concept in the public policy of this State is that the best interest and welfare of the children are paramount when deciding matters of visitation, child support and child custody." (citations omitted)). Above all, "[c]ases involving children must be decided not just in the context of competing sets of adults' rights, but also with a regard for the rights of the child(ren)." Syl. pt. 7, In re Brian D., 194 W. Va. 623, 461 S.E.2d 129 (1995).

Mr. R. also suggests that the continuation of his support obligation could have inequitable consequences if Stephen is ultimately adopted by another individual.[22] In this scenario, Mr. R. contends that the adoptive parent would then essentially be relieved of his/her obligation to support Stephen because such responsibility had already been attributed to Mr. R. Again, though, the Legislature has foreseen and definitively addressed this quandary.

[22]It goes without saying, however, that Mr. R.'s argument on this point, and our analysis thereof, pertains only to the limited context of adoptions of children whose parent's parental rights have been terminated as a result of abuse and/or neglect proceedings. Our discussion herein does not apply to adoptions generally or to cases involving the voluntary relinquishment of parental rights.

Although seemingly final, dispositions made in accordance with W. Va. Code § 49-6-5 may subsequently be modified. W. Va. Code § 49-6-6 (1977) (Repl. Vol. 2001) directs > [u]pon motion of a child, a child's parent or custodian or the state department alleging a change of circumstances requiring a different disposition, the court shall conduct a hearing pursuant to section two [§ 49-6-2] of this article and may modify a dispositional order: Provided, That a dispositional order pursuant to subdivision (6), subsection (a) of section five [§ 49-6-5(a)(6)] shall not be modified after the child has been adopted. Adequate and timely notice of any motion for modification shall be given to the child's counsel, counsel for the child's parent or custodian and to the state department.

Where, as here, multiple statutes relate to the same general body of law, they must be read consistently with one another. "Statutes which relate to the same subject matter should be read and applied together so that the Legislature's intention can be gathered from the whole of the enactments." Syl. pt. 3, Smith v. State Workmen's Comp. Comm'r, 159 W. Va. 108, 219 S.E.2d 361. Accord Syl. pt. 2, in part, Beckley v. Kirk, 193 W. Va. 258, 455 S.E.2d 817 (1995) ("Statutes in pari materia, [sic] must be construed together and the legislative intention, as gathered from the whole of the enactments, must be given effect." (internal quotations and citations omitted)); Syl. pt. 5, in part, Fruehauf Corp. v. Huntington Moving & Storage Co., 159 W. Va. 14, 217 S.E.2d 907 (1975) ("Statutes which relate to the same persons or things, or to the same class of persons or things, or statutes which have a common purpose will be regarded in pari materia to assure recognition and implementation of the legislative intent.").

Reading W. Va. Code § 49-6-6 in conjunction with W. Va. Code § 49-6-5 leads to the logical conclusion that a modification motion may be made to request the presiding court to review a disposition that has imposed upon a parent an obligation to provide support for his/her child. Therefore, we hold that a circuit court may, in the course of modifying a previously-entered dispositional order in an abuse and neglect case in accordance with W. Va. Code § 49-6-6 (1977) (Repl. Vol. 2001), amend a parent's continuing child support obligation or the amount thereof.[23] The court may not, however, modify said dispositional order to cancel accrued child support or decretal judgments resulting from child support arrearages.[24]

[23]Permitting a court to modify child support awards in abuse and neglect cases is consistent with the statutory law permitting such modification in other domestic matters. See generally W. Va. Code § 48-11-105(a) (2001) (Supp. 2003) (allowing court to modify child support order upon proper motion demonstrating "a change in the circumstances of a parent or another proper person or persons").

[24]Such a limitation upon the circuit court's ability to modify orders of support has been explicitly stated by both this Court and by the Legislature. See, e.g., W. Va. Code § 48-1-204 (2001) (Repl. Vol. 2001) ("[A] child support order may not be retroactively modified so as to cancel or alter accrued installments of support."); Syl. pt. 2, in part, Goff v. Goff, 177 W. Va. 742, 356 S.E.2d 496 (1987) ("The authority of the circuit courts to modify . . . child support awards is prospective only and, absent a showing of fraud or other judicially cognizable circumstance in procuring the original award, a circuit court is without authority to modify or cancel accrued . . . child support installments."); Syl. pt. 2, Horton v. Horton, 164 W. Va. 358, 264 S.E.2d 160 (1980) (per curiam) ("A circuit court lacks the power to alter or cancel accrued installments for child support."). See also W. Va. Code § 48-1-204 ("[T]he total of any matured, unpaid installments of child support required to be paid by an order entered or modified by a court of competent jurisdiction, or by the order of a magistrate court of this state, . . . shall stand, by operation of law, as a decretal judgment against the obligor owing such support."); Carter v. Carter, 198 W. Va. 171, 175, 479 S.E.2d 681, 685 (1996) ("[C]hild support (continued...)

Having found the circuit court's order terminating Mr. R.'s parental rights while continuing his support obligation to have been within the court's statutory authority to render dispositions in abuse and neglect cases, we find no reversible error and affirm the circuit court's ruling to that effect.

IV.

CONCLUSION

For the foregoing reasons, we find that the circuit court did not commit reversible error by holding the adjudicatory hearing in Robert R.'s absence; finding Mr. R. to be responsible for the abuse and/or neglect of his son, Stephen Tyler R.; and ordering Mr. R. to continue paying child support following the termination of his parental rights to his son. Accordingly, the November 27, 2001, order of the Circuit Court of Raleigh County is hereby affirmed.

SYLLABUS BY THE COURT

1. "Although conclusions of law reached by a circuit court are subject to de novo review, when an action, such as an abuse and neglect case, is tried upon the facts without a jury, the circuit court shall make a determination based upon the evidence and shall make findings of fact and conclusions of law as to whether such child is abused or neglected. These findings shall not be set aside by a reviewing court unless clearly erroneous. A finding is clearly erroneous when, although there is evidence to support the finding, the reviewing court on the entire evidence is left with the definite and firm conviction that a mistake has been committed. However, a reviewing court may not overturn a finding simply because it would have decided the case differently, and it must affirm a finding if the circuit court's account of the evidence is plausible in light of the record viewed in its entirety." Syllabus Point 1, In the Interest of Tiffany Marie S., 196 W.Va. 223, 470 S.E.2d 177 (1996).

2. "Under Rule 19 of the West Virginia Rules of Procedure for Child Abuse and Neglect Proceedings, amendments to an abuse/neglect petition may be allowed at any time before the final adjudicatory hearing begins. When modification of an abuse/neglect petition is sought, the circuit court should grant such petition absent a showing that the adverse party will not be permitted sufficient time to respond to the amendment, consistent with the intent underlying Rule 19 to permit liberal amendment of abuse/neglect petitions." Syllabus Point 4, State v. Julie G., 201 W.Va. 764, 500 S.E.2d 877 (1997).

3. "To facilitate the prompt, fair and thorough resolution of abuse and neglect actions, if, in the course of a child abuse and/or neglect proceeding, a circuit court

discerns from the evidence or allegations presented that reasonable cause exists to believe that additional abuse or neglect has occurred or is imminent which is not encompassed by the allegations contained in the Department of Health and Human Resource's petition, then pursuant to Rule 19 of the Rules of Procedure for Child Abuse and Neglect Proceedings [1997] the circuit court has the inherent authority to compel the Department to amend its petition to encompass the evidence or allegations." Syllabus Point 5, In re: Randy H., 220 W.Va. 122, 640 S.E.2d 185 (2006).

Per Curiam:

In this appeal from the Circuit Court of Brooke County, we are asked to review a circuit court order that denied a guardian ad litem's motion to amend a petition alleging that a child had been abused and/or neglected. As set forth below, we reverse the circuit court's order.

I.

This case centers upon the welfare of Summer D., a 37-month-old child (at the time of this opinion) who has spent all but four months of her life in foster care. Summer D. is the natural daughter of April T. and Douglas D.

Summer D. was born in December 2004, and resided with her parents in West Virginia. In April 2005, the West Virginia Department of Health and Human Resources ("DHHR") learned that April T. had previously mothered two children by a different father, and that the State of Missouri had entered an order terminating April T.'s parental rights to those two children because of neglect. Following receipt of the Missouri order, the DHHR filed a petition in the instant case alleging generally that Summer D. had been abused and/or neglected by her parents, April T. and Douglas D.

As a result of the petition, Summer D. was placed in foster care in the custody of the DHHR, and a guardian ad litem was appointed to represent her before the circuit court. After hearings before the circuit court, an improvement plan was implemented for April T.

No improvement plan was offered or implemented for Douglas D. who, although not married, lived with April T.

In September 2006, Summer D.'s guardian ad litem filed two motions with the circuit court. In the first motion, the guardian ad litem asked the circuit court to terminate April T.'s improvement plan. The guardian ad litem's second motion asked the circuit court for permission to amend the DHHR's petition to allege that April T. had "significant deficits as a result of her lower I.Q., which impairs her ability to parent appropriately and safely." The motion also proposed that the petition be amended to allege that because Douglas D. "refuses to acknowledge that [April T.] has significant deficits that impair her parenting skills," Douglas D. could not adequately protect Summer D. from harm.

After taking evidence from the parties, in an order dated January 18, 2007, the circuit court granted the guardian ad litem's motion to terminate April T.'s improvement plan. The circuit court concluded that although she had made a good faith effort, April T. would never be able to meet the requirements of the plan.

However, the circuit court denied the guardian ad litem's motion to amend the petition. The circuit court found that April T. and Douglas D. had been cooperative during the proceedings. Further, the circuit court expressed confidence in Douglas D.'s parenting skills, and found him to be "a supportive father to the child" and "a supportive companion" to April T. As a matter of law, the circuit court concluded:

> [T]he failure of Respondent Douglas [D.] to acknowledge the impairment of Respondent April [T.] is not a sufficient legal basis to seek termination of parent rights[.]

The circuit court then ordered the parties to develop a plan to gradually return the child to Douglas D.'s custody.

The guardian ad litem and the DHHR now appeal the circuit court's January 18, 2007 order. The order was stayed pending the resolution of this appeal.

II.

The guardian ad litem and the DHHR argue that the circuit court's decisions concerning Douglas D. were in error on two grounds. They argue, first, that this Court should weigh the evidence of record, declare Douglas D. to be an unfit parent, and prohibit the circuit court from ever returning Summer D. to his custody.

Much to our dismay, court-appointed counsel for Douglas D. failed to file any briefs with this Court – briefs that might have expedited this Court's response to the arguments posed by the guardian ad litem and the DHHR. Fortunately, counsel for Douglas D. did appear at oral arguments to offer a response, albeit a cursory one. Essentially, counsel for Douglas D. asserted that even though the circuit court refused to permit the amendment of the abuse and/or neglect petition, and even though no improvement plan or other assessment focused solely upon Douglas D.'s parenting skills was performed, the circuit court had sufficient evidence to find Douglas D. to be a fit parent.

Our standard of review in abuse and neglect actions was set forth in Syllabus Point 1 of In the Interest of Tiffany Marie S., 196 W.Va. 223, 470 S.E.2d 177 (1996), where we held:

> Although conclusions of law reached by a circuit court are subject to de novo review, when an action, such as an abuse and neglect case, is tried upon the facts without a jury, the circuit court shall make a determination based upon the evidence and shall make findings of fact and conclusions of law as to whether such child is abused or neglected. These findings shall not be set aside by a reviewing court unless clearly erroneous. A finding is clearly erroneous when, although there is evidence to support the finding, the reviewing court on the entire evidence is left with the definite and firm conviction that a mistake has been committed. However, a reviewing court may not overturn a finding simply because it would have decided the case differently, and it must affirm a finding if the circuit court's account of the evidence is plausible in light of the record viewed in its entirety.

The record in this case was developed as an assessment of April T.'s abilities, and not Douglas D.'s parenting skills. In the circuit court, the parties – including the guardian ad litem and the DHHR – focused entirely upon April T.; evidence regarding Douglas D.'s abilities appears to have been developed secondary to the process.

In an abuse and neglect action, this Court must affirm a finding if the circuit court's account of the evidence is plausible in light of the record viewed in its entirety. We find that the record was not sufficiently developed with respect to Douglas D.'s parenting skills to render a competent decision either way. As the record currently stands, this Court cannot – as the appellants wish – render a decision regarding Douglas D.'s parenting skills ab initio. That is an assessment that must be performed by the circuit court in the first instance.

The appellants' second argument is that the circuit court should have permitted the guardian ad litem to amend the petition to include allegations against Douglas D. The appellants argue that reasonable cause exists sufficient to believe that neglect of Summer D. may be imminent. As such, the appellants argue that the circuit court was legally empowered to not only permit an amendment, but to go so far as to compel an amendment of the petition, to allow the development of a record on this point. We agree with the appellants' position.

Rule 19 of the Rules of Procedure for Child Abuse and Neglect Proceedings states, in pertinent part:

> The court may allow the petition to be amended at any time until the final adjudicatory hearing begins, provided that an adverse party is granted sufficient time to respond to the amendment.

In Syllabus Point 4 of State v. Julie G., 201 W.Va. 764, 500 S.E.2d 877 (1997), we interpreted Rule 19 to liberally allow amendments to an abuse or neglect petition:

> Under Rule 19 of the West Virginia Rules of Procedure for Child Abuse and Neglect Proceedings, amendments to an abuse/neglect petition may be allowed at any time before the final adjudicatory hearing begins. When modification of an abuse/neglect petition is sought, the circuit court should grant such petition absent a showing that the adverse party will not be permitted sufficient time to respond to the amendment, consistent with the intent underlying Rule 19 to permit liberal amendment of abuse/neglect petitions.

And in Syllabus Point 5 of In re: Randy H., 220 W.Va. 122, 640 S.E.2d 185 (2006) we held that circuit courts could compel the amendment of a petition if reasonable cause exists to believe that additional abuse or neglect is imminent, but not encompassed by the allegations in the existing petition:

> To facilitate the prompt, fair and thorough resolution of abuse and neglect actions, if, in the course of a child abuse and/or > neglect proceeding, a circuit court discerns from the evidence or allegations presented that reasonable cause exists to believe that additional abuse or neglect has occurred or is imminent which is not encompassed by the allegations contained in the Department of Health and Human Resource's petition, then pursuant to Rule 19 of the Rules of Procedure for Child Abuse and Neglect Proceedings [1997] the circuit court has the inherent authority to compel the Department to amend its petition to encompass the evidence or allegations.

We believe that the existing record contains evidence and allegations sufficient to present reasonable cause to believe that additional abuse or neglect of Summer D. by the respondent, Douglas D., is imminent, but is not encompassed by the allegations contained in the DHHR's original petition. Accordingly, we find that the circuit court erred when it refused to permit the guardian ad litem's motion to amend the petition.

III.

The circuit court's January 18, 2007 order denying the guardian ad litem's motion to amend the petition was in error. On remand, the circuit court should permit the liberal amendment of the petition, so that the allegations of potential harm to Summer D. may be more fully developed, clarified, and promptly resolved.

Reversed and Remanded.

Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia

v.

T.C., Infant and B.B., Mother; and P.B., Stepfather

No. 15793

May 25, 1983

SYLLABUS BY THE COURT

1. In a child abuse and neglect hearing, before a court can begin to make any of the dispositional alternatives under W.Va.Code, 49-6-5, it must hold a hearing under W.Va.Code, 49-6-2, and determine "whether such child is abused or neglected." Such a finding is a prerequisite to further continuation of the case.

2. W.Va.Code, 49-6-1, et seq., does not foreclose the ability of the parties, properly counseled, in a child abuse or neglect proceeding, to make some voluntary dispositional plan. However, such arrangements are not without restrictions. First, the plan is subject to the approval of the court. Second, and of greater importance, the parties cannot circumvent the threshold question which is the issue of abuse or neglect.

Chauncey H. Browning, Atty. Gen., and Mary Beth Kershner, Asst. Atty. Gen., Charleston, for appellant.

MILLER, Justice:

This is an appeal by the State of West Virginia protesting an order of the Circuit Court of Nicholas County, which restored the custody of T.C., then age four and one-half years, to the appellees, the child's mother and stepfather. We are asked to determine what procedures are required by West Virginia law in cases of alleged child abuse and to determine if those requirements were met in this case.

In June, 1980, T.C., then age three and one-half years, was brought by her stepfather, P.B., to the emergency room of the hospital in Summersville. He explained that the little girl had injured her leg by falling in the bathtub while bathing. X-rays taken in Summersville and subsequently in Charleston revealed a spiral fracture of her left upper leg and a healing spiral fracture of her left upper arm. Pursuant to these findings, a report of child abuse was made to the Department of Welfare in Nicholas County under W.Va.Code, 49-6A-2. See footnote 1

In July, 1980, the Department of Welfare filed a petition for emergency custody of T.C., and an order was entered removing her from the custody of her mother and stepfather and placing the child with her mother's aunt.

At a hearing on July 23, 1980, the testimony of Dr. Jacobson, who had examined T.C. at the Summersville hospital, was presented. The doctor's opinion was that the child's fractures could only have been caused by "a significant rather marked force applied in the opposite direction to the upper and lower end of the leg." Before the next witness could testify, a private conference was held by the child's parents, the Welfare personnel, and all counsel. The parties agreed that the child would be taken out of the aunt's custody and placed in a foster home, that the mother and stepfather would undergo psychological evaluations, and that the parents could visit the child during this period. The court approved this agreement, but no finding of abuse was made.

No further action was taken in this case for almost eight months. On March 6, 1981, Welfare Department workers, the parents, and counsel for the parties again appeared before the court. At that time, the court was advised of what had transpired since the last hearing, but no evidence was taken. The court noted that the parents' psychological evaluations in 1980 had not revealed "anything bad" and that no criminal charges had been brought against P.B. See footnote 2 Based upon further information that the child had been out of the parents' home for a long time, and that visitation arrangements had been difficult in the foster home and at alternative sites, the court determined that the child's custody should be returned to the parents after a transition period of five-weeks of increased visitation. No order was entered reflecting these arrangements.

On August 10, 1981, over one year after T.C.'s injuries, a third hearing was held. This hearing was apparently based on a new petition filed in June, 1981, by the Welfare Department, which alleged the same instances of abuse as set forth in the first petition and the need for a rehabilitation program. This hearing was, however, conducted as a continuation of earlier proceedings and has been referred to by the appellants as a dispositional hearing under W.Va.Code, 49-6-5. Again, no testimony was heard. The Nicholas County Prosecuting Attorney acknowledged that the child was then in the custody of the parents. See footnote 3 The prosecutor requested that legal custody remain with the Department such that the child could physically reside with her parents but that the Department could legally enter the home at frequent intervals to observe and monitor the home situation. At the August 10, 1981, hearing the court ordered a "rehabilitation plan" such that the legal and physical custody went to the parents, and that the Welfare Department would be permitted to monitor the child and the home. The order was entered in October, 1981.

In April, 1982, the State appealed the order returning custody to the parents, and requested a stay of that judgment. We granted the appeal and stay, and on January 26, 1983, ordered that temporary physical custody be awarded to the Department of Welfare pending the outcome of this decision.

The State's primary argument is that W.Va.Code, 49-6-1, et seq., requires certain mandatory hearings and findings by a circuit court once an abuse or neglect petition has been filed, and that these statutory requirements have not been met. In State ex rel. Miller v. Locke, 162 W.Va. 946, 253 S.E.2d 540 (1979), we found that W.Va.Code, 49-6-1, et seq., meets the constitutional due process standards set out in Stanley v. Illinois, 405 U.S. 645, 92 S.Ct. 1208, 31 L.Ed.2d 551 (1972), and in In Re: Willis, 157 W.Va. 225, 207 S.E.2d 129 (1973). We also concluded that its various sections should be read in pari materia.

It is instructive to briefly review some of the procedural steps authorized by this statute. The content and service of the initial petition to institute a child abuse or neglect proceeding is contained in W.Va.Code, 49-6-1. In the next section, general provisions are made for the right to counsel and the appointment of counsel in cases of indigency. This section also permits the parents or custodian to have an improvement period, provides for hearing rights (i.e., a meaningful opportunity to be heard), and requires that the court "shall make findings of fact and conclusions of law as to whether such child is abused or neglected." W.Va.Code, 49-6-2(c). Finally, this section authorizes the right to a transcript of the hearing for purposes of an appeal. W.Va.Code, 49-6-2(d).

It is important to note the interrelationship between W.Va.Code, 49- 6-2, and W.Va.Code, 49-6-5, which provides for dispositional alternatives and begins with this statement:

> "Following a determination pursuant to section two [§ 49-6-2] of this article, the court m ay request from the state department information about the history, physical condition and present situation of the child. The court shall forthwith proceed to dis position giving both the petitioner and respondents an opportunity to be heard. The court shall give precedence to dispositions in the following sequence."

We believe that the statutory structure is clear and that before a court can begin to make any of the dispositional alternatives under W.Va.Code, 49-6-5, it must have held a hearing under W.Va.Code, 49-6-2, and have determined "whether such child is abused or neglected." Such a finding is the prerequisite to any further proceedings in the case. If the court determines that there is insufficient evidence to warrant a finding of abuse or neglect, then the petition is dismissed under W.Va.Code, 49-6-5(a)(1). On the other hand, if neglect or abuse is found, then the other dispositional alternatives under W.Va.Code, 49-6-5, are to be considered. See footnote 4

The primary purpose of making an initial finding of abuse or neglect is to protect the interest of all parties and to justify the continued jurisdiction under W.Va.Code, 49-6-1, et seq. Several courts have spoken to this issue under statutes which are analogous to ours, as illustrated by this discussion in In the Interest of T.M.M., 267 N.W.2d 807, 812 (N.D.1978):

> "The Act clearly provides for a tw o-stage hearing on petitions alleging deprivation. The first phase of th e hearing is often referred to as the adjudicatory phase, wherein the only que stion for decision is whether the child is ' deprived' within the meani ng of Section 27-20-02, subsection 5. In the adjudicatory phase of the hearing, the primary issue is not what is in the best interest of the child, but rather whether there is clear and convincing evidence that the child is deprived. Interest of R.D.S., 259 N.W.2d 636 (N.D.1977); In Interest of M.L., [239 N.W.2d 289 (N.D.1976)]. It is only after the court has f ound the child to be deprived that the question of what disposition will best serve the interests of the child arises. "The second phase of the hearing, the dispositional phase, is to be conducted only after the court has first found the child deprived. If there is no such finding, the court ' shall di smiss the petition' and no longer has jurisdiction of the case. In Interest of M.L., supra."

A similar result was reached by the Montana court in In the Matter of L.F.G., 183 Mont. 239, 245-46,, 598 P.2d 1125, 1129 (1979), where the court stated:

> "[T]hese statutes make it clear th at a finding of abuse, neglect, or dependency is the jurisdictional prerequisite to any court ordered transfer of custody.... Appellants argue it is then, a nd only then, that the ' best interest of the child' standard so well established by this Court has its application in the resolution of the question of custody .... Thus, before the District Court may consider what the ' best interests of the child' may in fact be, the court must have found that the child in ques tion was in fact abused or neglected pursuant to statutory definition in section 41-3-102(2), MCA." (Citations omitted)

See also Custody of a Minor, 377 Mass. 876, 389 N.E.2d 68 (1979); In the Interest of LaRue, 244 Pa.Super. 218, 366 A.2d 1271 (1976).

While today's result is based upon our construction of W.Va.Code, 49-6-1, et seq., we are aided by this Court's decision in In Re: Willis, supra, which established the constitutional protections afforded to parents in permanent child removal cases. In Syllabus Point 6, the "clear, cogent and convincing" standard of proof was set, and that standard was recently adopted under Fourteenth Amendment Due Process principles in Santosky v.

Kramer, 455 U.S. 745, 102 S.Ct. 1388, 71 L.Ed.2d 599 (1982). In Syllabus Point 8 of Willis, supra, we also said:

> "Once a court exercising proper jurisdiction has made a determination upon sufficient proof that a child has been neglected and his natural parents were so derelict in their duties as to be unfit, the welfare of the infant is the polar star by which the discretion of the court is to be guided in making its award of legal custody."

The central theme of Willis was that the integrity of the family as a unit arises from the freedom of choice in matters of family life, which is a "fundamental personal liberty guaranteed by the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment." 157 W.Va. at 237, 207 S.E.2d at 136, citing Stanley v. Illinois, supra. Similar language is found in Santosky v. Kramer, supra. As recognized in Willis and in United States Supreme Court cases, the state does have a right to intervene where parents are shown to be unfit to protect the interests of the children, as illustrated by this quotation from Quilloin v. Walcott, 434 U.S. 246, 255, 98 S.Ct. 549, 555, 54 L.Ed.2d 511, 520 (1978):

> "We have little doubt that the Due Process Clause would be offended '[i]f a State were to attempt to force the breakup of a natural family, over the objections of the parents and their children, without some showing of unfitness and for the sole reason that to do so was thought to be in the children's best interest.' Smith v. Organization of Foster Families, 431 U.S. 816, 862-63, [97 S.Ct. 2094, 2119, 53 L.Ed.2d 14, 46-47] (1977) (Stewart, J., concurring in judgment)." (Emphasis added)

It is apparent that the state's right to intervene is predicated upon its initial showing that there has been child abuse or neglect, which constitutes unfitness on the part of the parents to continue, either temporarily or permanently, in their custodial role.

In the present case, the hearing under W.Va.Code, 49-6-2, was aborted when the parties entered into some type of voluntary arrangement regarding the custody of T.C. While we do not find that W.Va.Code, 49-6-1, et seq., forecloses the ability of the parties, properly counseled, in a child abuse or neglect proceeding, to make some voluntary dispositional plan, such arrangements are not without restrictions. First, the plan is subject to the approval of the court. Second, and of greater importance, the parties cannot circumvent the threshold question, which is the issue of abuse or neglect. See footnote 5 Thus, we find that the procedure in the lower court contains a palpable error, which is the absence of an initial finding by the court that there has or has not been child abuse or neglect. Absent such a finding, the dispositional aspects of the case could not be considered.

It could be that some confusion was engendered in the lower court by the fact that the child had been initially taken into temporary custody under W.Va.Code, 49-6-3(a). The parties and the court appeared to conceive that the issue at the July 23, 1980, hearing was whether temporary custody should be continued. However, it is clear that W.Va.Code, 49-6-3(a), permitting an ex parte taking of temporary custody, does not provide for a further hearing to determine whether temporary custody should be continued. See footnote 6 This provision, as we have stated in State ex rel. Miller v. Locke, 162 W.Va.at 949, 253 S.E.2d at 542-43, is designed to permit > "a circuit court to order emergency-taking only after the court has found (1) that there exists an imminent danger to the physical well-being of the child; and (2) that there are no reasonably ava ilable alternatives to removal of the child, including, but not limited to, the provision of medical, psychological, or homemaking services to eliminat e the danger and permit the child to remain in his current custody."

Furthermore, while W.Va.Code, 49-6-3(b), See footnote 7 authorizes an alternative procedure for a court to utilize in taking temporary custody of a child by providing for an expedited preliminary hearing with notice to the parents, this procedure does not operate to bypass the hearing to determine neglect or abuse required under W.Va.Code, 49-6-2. This construction arises because of the provision in W.Va.Code, 49-6-3(b), that requires the court to find "that there are no alternatives less drastic than removal of the child and that a hearing on the petition cannot be scheduled in the interim period." (Emphasis added)

Because there was no initial finding of abuse in this case, we must remand this case with directions that the lower court promptly hold a hearing under W.Va.Code, 49-6-2, in order to determine if the child was abused. At such hearing, the court may consider the evidentiary transcript of the July 23, 1980, hearing since all parties were present and had an opportunity to cross- examine. After holding the hearing and making findings of fact of whether the child was abused, the lower court should then proceed to make an appropriate disposition under W.Va.Code, 49-6-5.

Remanded.

Footnote: 1 The relevant portion of W.Va.Code, 49-6A-2, is:
"When any medical, dental or mental health professional, christian science practitioner, religious healer, schoolteacher or other school personnel, social service worker, child care or foster care worker, peace officer or law-enforcement official has reasonable cause to suspect that a child is neglected or abused or observes the child being subjected to conditions that are likely to result in abuse or neglect, such person shall immediately report the circumstances or cause a report to be made to the state department child protective service."

Footnote: 2 Ordinarily, whether or not the State has filed criminal charges in regard to child abuse is irrelevant in a proceeding under W.Va.Code, 49-6-1, et seq., to remove custody of the child. In the Interest of Black, 273 Pa.Super. 536, 417 A.2d 1178 (1980). The purpose of the removal proceeding is to protect the well-being of the child.

Footnote: 3 Apparently, one week before this hearing the Welfare Department had, pursuant to its newly filed petition, again removed T.C. and replaced her in the foster home. Immediately thereafter, the parents retrieved the child.

Footnote: 4 The material dispositional provisions of W.Va.Code, 49-6- 5(a), are:
"The court shall give precedence to dispositions in the following sequence:
"(1) Dismiss the petition;
"(2) Refer the child and the child's parent or custodian to a community agency for needed assistance and dismiss the petition;
"(3) Return the child to his own home under supervision of the state department;
"(4) Order terms of supervision calculated to assist the child and the child's parent or custodian which prescribe the manner of supervision and care of the child and which are within the ability of the parent or custodian to perform;
"(5) Upon a finding that the parents or custodians are presently unwilling or unable to provide adequately for the child's needs, commit the child temporarily to the custody of the state department, a licensed private child welfare agency or a suitable person who may be appointed guardian by the court; "(6) Upon a finding that there is no reasonable likelihood that the conditions of neglect or abuse can be substantially corrected in the near future, and when necessary for the welfare of the child, terminate the parental or custodial rights and responsibilities and commit the child to the permanent guardianship of the state department or a licensed child welfare agency. Notwithstanding any other provisions of this article, the permanent parental rights shall not be terminated if a child fourteen years of age or older or otherwise of an age of discretion as determined by the court, objects to such termination. No adoption of a child shall take place until all proceedings for termination of parental rights under this article and appeals thereof are final."

Footnote: 5 We recognize that W.Va.Code, 49-6-2(c), provides that in an abuse or neglect case "[t]he petition shall not be taken as confessed." We conceive that this provision is designed to preclude a court from removing custody based merely on the allegations of the original petition. In In re Nicole B., 93 Cal.App.3d 874, 155 Cal.Rptr. 916 (1979), the court found that under voluntary stipulations by the parties a showing of abuse and neglect had been made. See also State v. Worrell, 198 Neb. 507, 253 N.W.2d 843 (1977).

Footnote: 6 W.Va.Code, 49-6-3(a), states:
"Upon the filing of a petition, the court may order that the child be delivered for not more than ten days into the custody of the state department or a responsible relative, pending a preliminary hearing, if it finds that: (1) There exists imminent danger to the physical well-being of the child, and (2) there are no reasonably available alternatives to removal of the child, including, but not limited to, the provision of medical, psychiatric, psychological or homemaking services in the child's present custody. The initial order directing such custody shall contain an order appointing counsel and scheduling the preliminary hearing, and upon its service shall require the immediate transfer of custody of such child to the state department or a responsible relative."

Footnote: 7 W.Va.Code, 49-6-3(b), provides:
"Whether or not the court orders immediate transfer of custody as provided in subsection (a) of this section, if the facts alleged in the petition demonstrate to the court that there exists imminent danger to the child, the court may schedule a preliminary hearing giving the respondents at least five days' actual notice. If the court finds at the preliminary hearing that there are no alternatives less drastic than removal of the child and that a hearing on the petition cannot be scheduled in the interim period, the court may order that the child be delivered into the temporary custody of the state department or an appropriate person or agency for a period not exceeding thirty days: Provided, that if the court grants an improvement period as provided in subsection (b), section two [§ 49-6-2] of this article, the thirty-day limit upon temporary custody may be waived."

Justice McHugh delivered the Opinion of the Court.

SYLLABUS BY THE COURT

1. "Although conclusions of law reached by a circuit court are subject to de novo review, when an action, such as an abuse and neglect case, is tried upon the facts without a jury, the circuit court shall make a determination based upon the evidence and shall make findings of fact and conclusions of law as to whether such child is abused or neglected. These findings shall not be set aside by a reviewing court unless clearly erroneous. A finding is clearly erroneous when, although there is evidence to support the finding, the reviewing court on the entire evidence is left with the definite and firm conviction that a mistake has been committed. However, a reviewing court may not overturn a finding simply because it would have decided the case differently, and it must affirm a finding if the circuit court's account of the evidence is plausible in light of the record viewed in its entirety." Syl. Pt. 1, In the Interest of Tiffany Marie S., 196 W.Va. 223, 470 S.E.2d 177 (1996).

2. "Although parents have substantial rights that must be protected, the primary goal in cases involving abuse and neglect, as in all family law matters, must be the health and welfare of the children." Syl. Pt. 3, In re Katie S., 198 W.Va. 79, 479 S.E.2d 589 (1996).

3. "In a child abuse and neglect [case], before a court can begin to make any of the dispositional alternatives under W.Va.Code, 49–6–5, it must hold a hearing under W.Va.Code, 49–6–2, and determine 'whether such child is abused or neglected.' Such a finding is a prerequisite to further continuation of the case." Syl. Pt. 1, State v. T.C., 172 W.Va. 47, 303 S.E.2d 685 (1983).

4. "W.Va.Code, 49-6-1, et seq., does not foreclose the ability of the parties, properly counseled, in a child abuse or neglect proceeding, to make some voluntary dispositional plan. However, such arrangements are not without restrictions. First, the plan is subject to the approval of the court. Second, and of greater importance, the parties cannot circumvent the threshold question which is the issue of abuse or neglect." Syl. Pt. 2, State v. T.C., 172 W.Va. 47, 303 S.E.2d 685 (1983).

5. "Where it appears from the record that the process established by the Rules of Procedure for Child Abuse and Neglect Proceedings and related statutes for the disposition of cases involving children adjudicated to be abused or neglected has been substantially disregarded or frustrated, the resulting order of disposition will be vacated and the case remanded for compliance with that process and entry of an appropriate dispositional order." Syl. Pt. 5, In re Edward B., 210 W.Va. 621, 558 S.E.2d 620 (2001).

6. "A circuit court has discretion in an abuse and neglect proceeding to accept a proffered voluntary termination of parental rights, or to reject it and proceed to a decision on involuntary termination. Such discretion must be exercised after an independent review of all relevant factors, and the court is not obliged to adopt any position advocated by the Department of Health and Human Resources." Syl. Pt. 4, In re James G., 211 W. Va. 339, 566 S.E.2d 226 (2002).

7. "In a child abuse and neglect proceeding where abandonment of the child by either or both biological parents is alleged and proven, the circuit court should decide in the dispositional phase of the proceeding whether to terminate any or all parental rights to the child. Before making that decision, even where there are written relinquishments of parental rights, the circuit court is required to conduct a disposition hearing, pursuant to West Virginia Code § 49-6-5 (1999) and Rules 33 and 35 of the West Virginia Rules of Procedure for Child Abuse and Neglect Proceedings, at which the issue of such termination is specifically and thoroughly addressed." Syl. Pt. 3, State ex rel. DHHR v. Hill, 207 W.Va. 358, 532 S.E.2d 358 (2000).

8. "In a child abuse and/or neglect proceeding, even where the parties have stipulated to the predicate facts necessary for a termination of parental rights, a circuit court must hold a disposition hearing, in which the specific inquiries enumerated in Rules 33 and 35 of the Rules of Procedure for Child Abuse and Neglect Proceedings are made, prior to terminating an individual's parental rights." Syl. Pt. 2, In re Beth Ann B., 204 W.Va. 424, 513 S.E.2d 472 (1998).

9. In an abuse and neglect case, the offer of a voluntary relinquishment of parental rights does not obviate the statutory requirements regarding the necessity for proceeding with the adjudicatory and dispositional phases of the abuse and neglect case. Prior to accepting an offer of voluntary termination of parental rights, a reviewing court must conduct the hearings required by West Virginia Code §§ 49-6-2 and 49-6-5.

10. "To facilitate the prompt, fair and thorough resolution of abuse and neglect actions, if, in the course of a child abuse and/or neglect proceeding, a circuit court discerns from the evidence or allegations presented that reasonable cause exists to believe that additional abuse or neglect has occurred or is imminent which is not encompassed by the allegations contained in the Department of Health and Human Resource's petition, then pursuant to Rule 19 of the Rules of Procedure for Child Abuse and Neglect Proceedings [1997] the circuit court has the inherent authority to compel the Department to amend its petition to encompass the evidence or allegations." Syl. Pt. 5, In re Randy H., 220 W. Va. 122, 640 S.E.2d 185 (2006).

11. "'"Each child in an abuse and neglect case is entitled to effective representation of counsel. To further that goal, W.Va.Code [§] 49-6-2(a) [1992] mandates that a child has a right to be represented by counsel in every stage of abuse and neglect proceedings. Furthermore, Rule XIII of the West Virginia Rules for Trial Courts of Record provides that a guardian ad litem shall make a full and independent investigation of the facts involved in the proceeding, and shall make his or her recommendations known to the court. Rules 1.1 and 1.3 of the West Virginia Rules of Professional Conduct, respectively, require an attorney to provide competent representation to a client, and to act with reasonable diligence and promptness in representing a client." Syllabus Point 5, in part, In re Jeffrey R.L., 190 W.Va. 24, 435 S.E.2d 162 (1993).' Syl. Pt. 4, In re Christina L., 194 W.Va. 446, 460 S.E.2d 692 (1995)." Syl. Pt. 4, In re Elizabeth A., 217 W.Va. 197, 617 S.E.2d 547 (2005).

McHugh, Justice:

This is an appeal by Stephanie D.[1] (hereinafter "Petitioner") from an order of the Circuit Court of Berkeley County accepting the voluntary relinquishment of parental rights by John W. (hereinafter "John W." or "father") to his two eldest children and dismissing his two youngest children from the case. Upon thorough review of the briefs, arguments, applicable precedent, and the record, this Court reverses the lower court's order and remands this matter for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.

I. Factual and Procedural History

This matter involves abuse and neglect allegations affecting the four children of John W. His eldest two children, T.W. and C.W. were born on March 8, 1995, and March 25, 1996, respectively. The mother of these two children, Wendy P., has not had substantial contact with T.W. or C.W., has relinquished her parental rights to these children, and is not a party to this action. John W.'s two youngest children, S.W. and J.W., were born on April 4, 1997, and April 10, 2006, respectively. The mother of these two children is Petitioner Stephanie D., and these two children have resided with her in the State of Maryland since the divorce of John W. and Stephanie D. and the award of primary custody to Stephanie D. on March 3, 2010. Visitation was granted to the father, John W., every other weekend.

[1]In cases of a sensitive nature, this Court is careful to protect the identity of the parties. "We follow our past practice in juvenile and domestic relations cases which involve sensitive facts and do not utilize the last names of the parties." State ex rel. West Virginia Dept. of Human Servs. v. Cheryl M., 177 W.Va. 688, 689 n. 1, 356 S.E.2d 181, 182 n. 1 (1987) (citations omitted).

On June 12, 2010, a boyfriend of one of the older daughters allegedly raped S.W. while she was visiting her father in West Virginia.[2] That was the final visit between the father and the younger two children residing in Maryland. On June 22, 2010, Stephanie D. obtained a ninety-day temporary order suspending visitation between John W. and S.W. and J.W., based upon that allegation of sexual misconduct by the older daughter's boyfriend. That temporary order had expired by the time the underlying abuse and neglect proceedings were initiated.

On October 25, 2010, the West Virginia Department of Health and Human Resources (hereinafter "DHHR") received a referral indicating that the father, John W., had abandoned his two older children, T.W. and C.W., in West Virginia and that the living conditions in their home were deplorable. The DHHR investigated the allegations and filed an October 29, 2010, Abuse and Neglect Petition alleging that the father had abandoned the two older children. The DHHR cited deplorable home conditions, including the lack of running water; sanitation issues involving toilets and soiled clothing; lack of supervision for the children; physical abuse; and sexual misconduct.[3] Notably, although the petition named all four children, it did not include the allegations of rape of S.W. by her older sister's boyfriend while S.W. was visiting the father's home in West Virginia. On December 10, 2010, the DHHR filed an amended petition based upon T.W.'s malnourishment; a bruise on the hip of T.W., allegedly caused by physical violence; and sexual abuse of C.W. Even in the amended petition, there was no reference to the rape which allegedly occurred while S.W. was visiting in West Virginia.

On December 21, 2010, the Maryland court handling the divorce between John W. and Stephanie D. stayed further proceedings pending the outcome of the abuse and neglect proceedings in the Circuit Court of Berkeley County, West Virginia. On June 28, 2011, a hearing on the abuse and neglect proceedings was held in the Circuit Court of Berkeley County. At that hearing, counsel for John W. indicated that John W. wished to relinquish his parental rights to T.W. and C.W., but John W. maintained that he had not abused or neglected any of his children. Counsel for John W. further indicated that John W. did not want findings to be made on the abuse and neglect petition and apparently made his relinquishment of parental rights contingent upon the absence of further proceedings against him on the abuse and neglect petition. The DHHR moved to dismiss the case concerning S.W. and J.W., the two children residing in Maryland, and the lower court dismissed those two children from the case. Further, the lower court refused to consider an in camera hearing to consult with the older two children regarding the allegations of abuse and neglect and also accepted John W.'s voluntary relinquishment of parental rights for T.W. and C.W. without further inquiry.

Subsequent to the lower court's ruling, Stephanie D., as the non-offending parent, appealed that ruling to this Court. In her assignments of error on appeal, Petitioner contends that the lower court erred in (1) accepting John W.'s voluntary relinquishment of parental rights to T.W. and C.W. without conducting an evidentiary hearing to make factual findings on the allegations of abuse and neglect and to consider the best interests of S.W. and J.W.; (2) failing to appoint a separate guardian ad litem for S.W. and J.W., the two younger children residing in Maryland, as requested by the guardian ad litem who had been appointed for all four children; (3) failing to conduct an in camera hearing on the issue of potential testimony by the older children, T.W. and C.W., regarding allegations of abuse; and (4) dismissing the matter with regard to the children residing in Maryland, S.W. and J.W.

II. Standard of Review

This Court has consistently utilized a compound standard of review in matters of this nature. In In re Emily, 208 W.Va. 325, 540 S.E.2d 542 (2000), this Court stated that abuse and neglect proceedings will be evaluated under a "compound standard of review:

conclusions of law are subject to a de novo review, while findings of fact are weighed against a clearly erroneous standard." 208 W.Va. at 332, 540 S.E.2d at 549. The following standard of review, also applicable to this case, is enunciated in syllabus point one of In the Interest of Tiffany Marie S., 196 W.Va. 223, 470 S.E.2d 177 (1996):

> Although conclusions of law reached by a circuit court are subject to de novo review, when an action, such as an abuse and neglect case, is tried upon the facts without a jury, the circuit court shall make a determination based upon the evidence and shall make findings of fact and conclusions of law as to whether such child is abused or neglected. These findings shall not be set aside by a reviewing court unless clearly erroneous. A finding is clearly erroneous when, although there is evidence to support the finding, the reviewing court on the entire evidence is left with the definite and firm conviction that a mistake has been committed. However, a reviewing court may not overturn a finding simply because it would have decided the case differently, and it must affirm a finding if the circuit court's account of the evidence is plausible in light of the record viewed in its entirety.

This Court also remains mindful of the primary objective in cases of allegations of abuse and neglect. As this Court stated in syllabus point three of In re Katie S., 198 W.Va. 79, 479 S.E.2d 589 (1996), "[a]lthough parents have substantial rights that must be protected, the primary goal in cases involving abuse and neglect, as in all family law matters, must be the health and welfare of the children." Observing these standards of review, this Court addresses the arguments of the parties in this case.

III. Discussion

A. Circuit Court Hearing

In determining the appropriate resolution of any abuse and neglect proceeding, "the best interests of the child is the polar star by which decisions must be made which affect children." Michael K.T. v. Tina L.T., 182 W.Va. 399, 405, 387 S.E.2d 866, 872 (1989) (citation omitted). West Virginia Code § 49-6-1 (2005) (Supp. 2009) governs the filing and of an abuse and neglect proceeding and guides a circuit court in its consideration of such matters. That statute permits a petition to be filed when a child is believed to be abused and/or neglected and enumerates a circuit court's obligations in dealing with such a petition, providing as follows:

> (a) If the department or a reputable person believes that a child is neglected or abused, the department or the person may present a petition setting forth the facts to the circuit court in the county in which the child resides, or if the petition is being brought by the department, in the county in which the custodial respondent or other named party abuser resides, or in which the abuse or neglect occurred, or to the judge of the court in vacation. Under no circumstance may a party file a petition in more than one county based on the same set of facts. The petition shall be verified by the oath of some credible person having knowledge of the facts. The petition shall allege specific conduct including time and place, how such conduct comes within the statutory definition of neglect or abuse with references thereto, any supportive services provided by the department to remedy the alleged circumstances and the relief sought. Upon filing of the petition, the court shall set a time and place for a hearing and shall appoint counsel for the child. When there is an order for temporary custody pursuant to section three [§ 49–6–3] of this article, the hearing shall be held within thirty days of the order, > unless a continuance for a reasonable time is granted to a date certain, for good cause shown.

Following the mandates of the statutory scheme for the management of abuse and neglect cases, this Court has observed that "[i]n a child abuse and neglect [case], before a court can begin to make any of the dispositional alternatives under W.Va.Code, 49-6-5, it must hold a hearing under W.Va.Code, 49-6-2, and determine 'whether such child is abused or neglected.' Such a finding is a prerequisite to further continuation of the case." Syl. Pt. 1, State v. T.C., 172 W.Va. 47, 303 S.E.2d 685 (1983) (emphasis supplied).[4] In syllabus point two of T.C., this Court held as follows:

> W.Va.Code, 49–6–1, et seq., does not foreclose the ability of the parties, properly counseled, in a child abuse or neglect proceeding, to make some voluntary dispositional plan. However, such arrangements are not without restrictions. First, the plan is subject to the approval of the court. Second, and of greater importance, the parties cannot circumvent the threshold question which is the issue of abuse or neglect.

Furthermore, in syllabus point five of In re Edward B., 210 W.Va. 621, 558 S.E.2d 620 (2001), this Court explained the essential requirement that a reviewing court adhere to the mandates of the statutory scheme, stating as follows:

> Where it appears from the record that the process established by the Rules of Procedure for Child Abuse and Neglect Proceedings and related statutes for the disposition of > cases involving children adjudicated to be abused or neglected has been substantially disregarded or frustrated, the resulting order of disposition will be vacated and the case remanded for compliance with that process and entry of an appropriate dispositional order.

This Court has also specifically stated that "[d]ismissal of the petition without a hearing is a direct violation of the statutory mandate to hold a hearing on abuse and/or neglect petitions." In re Emily G., 224 W.Va. 390, 396, 686 S.E.2d 41, 47 (2009).

With regard to John W.'s offer of voluntary relinquishment of parental rights in the present case, this Court has stated that a circuit court has discretionary authority in an abuse and neglect proceeding to accept a voluntary relinquishment of parental rights and to terminate parental rights based upon such relinquishment. In re James G., 211 W. Va. 339, 566 S.E.2d 226 (2002); see also In re Kristopher E., 212 W. Va. 393, 572 S.E.2d 916 (2002). However, an independent review of all relevant factors must be undertaken prior to such determination, as this Court explained in syllabus point four of James G.,

> A circuit court has discretion in an abuse and neglect proceeding to accept a proffered voluntary termination of parental rights, or to reject it and proceed to a decision on involuntary termination. Such discretion must be exercised after an independent review of all relevant factors, and the court is not obliged to adopt any position advocated by the Department of Health and Human Resources.

211 W. Va. at 341, 566 S.E.2d at 228 (emphasis supplied). This Court also addressed an issue regarding the effect of an offer of voluntary relinquishment of parental rights in an abandonment abuse and neglect case in State ex rel. DHHR v. Hill, 207 W. Va. 358, 532 S.E.2d 358 (2000). This Court observed the requirement for a dispositional hearing and held as follows in syllabus point three:

> In a child abuse and neglect proceeding where abandonment of the child by either or both biological parents is alleged and proven, the circuit court should decide in the dispositional phase of the proceeding whether to terminate any or all parental rights to the child. Before making that decision, even where there are written relinquishments of parental rights, the circuit court is required to conduct a disposition hearing, pursuant to West Virginia Code § 49–6–5 (1999) and Rules 33 and 35 of the West Virginia Rules of Procedure for Child Abuse and Neglect Proceedings, at which the issue of such termination is specifically and thoroughly addressed.

207 W.Va. at 359, 532 S.E.2d at 359 (emphasis supplied).[5] Similarly, where the parties have stipulated to all facts necessary for a termination of parental rights, this Court has still held

[5]The Rules of Procedure for Child Abuse and Neglect Proceedings place certain requirements on actions involving voluntary terminations. Rules 33 and 35 address the voluntariness of consent to such terminations and whether they are in the best interests of the child or children. Rule 33(b) provides as follows:

> (b) Voluntariness of consent.—Before determining whether or not to accept a stipulation of disposition, the court shall determine that the parties and persons entitled to notice and the opportunity to be heard, understand the contents of the stipulation and its consequences, and that the parties voluntarily consent to its terms. The court must ultimately decide whether the stipulation of disposition meets the purposes of these rules, controlling statutes and is in the best interests of the child. The court shall hear any objection to the stipulation of disposition made by any party or persons entitled to notice and the opportunity to be heard. The stipulations shall be specifically incorporated in their entirety into the court's order reflecting disposition of the case.

Rule 35(a) addresses uncontested termination of parental rights and provides, in pertinent part, as follows:

> If a parent voluntarily relinquishes parental rights or fails to contest termination of parental rights, the court shall make the following inquiry at the disposition hearing:
> (3) If the parent(s) is/are present in court and voluntarily has/have signed a relinquishment of parental rights, the court shall determine whether the parent(s) fully understand(s) the consequences of a termination of parental rights, is/are aware of possible less drastic alternatives than termination, and was/were informed of the right to a hearing and to representation by counsel.

that a court cannot dispense with the dispositional hearing. In syllabus point two of In re Beth Ann B., 204 W.Va. 424, 513 S.E.2d 472 (1998), this Court stated as follows:

> In a child abuse and/or neglect proceeding, even where the parties have stipulated to the predicate facts necessary for a termination of parental rights, a circuit court must hold a disposition hearing, in which the specific inquiries enumerated in Rules 33 and 35 of the Rules of Procedure for Child Abuse and Neglect Proceedings are made, prior to terminating an individual's parental rights.

In the case sub judice, grievous allegations of abuse and neglect were raised, and the potential still exists for future visitation between John W. and the two children to whom his parental rights were not terminated. The granting of a consensual termination of parental rights without investigation into those allegations or findings with regard to the best interests of all four of these children is inconsistent with both the mandate of the statutes articulating the protocol for abuse and neglect cases and the prior cases decided by this Court.

Based upon the requirement of West Virginia Code § 49-6-1(a) that a circuit court presented with an abuse and neglect petition must hold a hearing thereon and further based upon the specific circumstances of this case, as reviewed above, this Court finds that the lower court abused its discretion by accepting the father's voluntary relinquishment of parental rights to two of his children and dismissing two other children without holding a full evidentiary hearing to address the specific allegations of abuse and neglect. In an abuse and neglect case, the offer of a voluntary relinquishment of parental rights does not obviate the statutory requirements regarding the necessity for proceeding with the adjudicatory and dispositional phases of the abuse and neglect case. Prior to accepting an offer of voluntary termination of parental rights, a reviewing court must conduct the hearings required by West Virginia Code §§ 49-6-2 and 49-6-5. The evidence of abuse and neglect in the present case was not evaluated in any meaningful fashion during the hearing, no evidence was taken, and the best interests of all four children, including the two children who were dismissed and residing with their mother in Maryland, were not addressed. This Court therefore vacates the lower court's order and remands this case to the circuit court for a full evidentiary hearing on all issues raised in the petition.

Furthermore, documentation was apparently presented to the DHHR during the pendency of this proceeding indicating that S.W. had been the victim of rape or sexual misconduct by her sister's boyfriend while S.W. was visiting her father in West Virginia, as referenced above. The DHHR should have included these allegations in an amended petition even though the facts underlying such allegations may not have been completely known when the original petition was filed. As this Court stated in syllabus point five of In re Randy H., 220 W. Va. 122, 640 S.E.2d 185 (2006):

> To facilitate the prompt, fair and thorough resolution of abuse and neglect actions, if, in the course of a child abuse > and/or neglect proceeding, a circuit court discerns from the evidence or allegations presented that reasonable cause exists to believe that additional abuse or neglect has occurred or is imminent which is not encompassed by the allegations contained in the Department of Health and Human Resource's petition, then pursuant to Rule 19 of the Rules of Procedure for Child Abuse and Neglect Proceedings [1997] the circuit court has the inherent authority to compel the Department to amend its petition to encompass the evidence or allegations.

Based upon the foregoing, the DHHR is directed, upon remand, to include allegations in the amended petition regarding the alleged rape and/or sexual misconduct suffered by S.W. while she was visiting her father in West Virginia.

B. Appointment of Guardian ad ltem

With regard to the appointment of a guardian ad litem for the four children involved in this case, this Court notes that the guardian ad litem originally appointed for all four children failed to conduct any meaningful investigation regarding the two children residing with their mother in Maryland. This Court has imposed strict requirements regarding guardians ad litem and has explained their duties as follows:

> "'Each child in an abuse and neglect case is entitled to effective representation of counsel. To further that goal, W.Va.Code [§] 49–6–2(a) [1992] mandates that a child has a right to be represented by counsel in every stage of abuse and neglect proceedings. Furthermore, Rule XIII of the West Virginia Rules for Trial Courts of Record provides that a guardian ad litem shall make a full and independent investigation of the facts involved in the proceeding, and shall make his or her recommendations known to the court. Rules 1.1 and 1.3 of the West Virginia Rules of Professional Conduct, > respectively, require an attorney to provide competent representation to a client, and to act with reasonable diligence and promptness in representing a client.' Syllabus Point 5, in part, In re Jeffrey R.L., 190 W.Va. 24, 435 S.E.2d 162 (1993)." Syl. Pt. 4, In re Christina L., 194 W.Va. 446, 460 S.E.2d 692 (1995).

Syl. Pt. 4, In re Elizabeth A., 217 W.Va. 197, 617 S.E.2d 547 (2005).

In the present case, the guardian ad litem attempted to exercise his duties with respect to the two children residing with their father in West Virginia and ultimately requested the lower court to appoint a separate guardian ad litem for the children residing in Maryland. This Court finds that the lower court abused its discretion in failing to grant the motion for the appointment of a separate guardian ad litem for John W.'s children residing in Maryland. Upon remand, the lower court is directed to appoint a separate guardian ad litem for the children residing in Maryland and to permit adequate time for that guardian ad litem to prepare for a full evidentiary hearing regarding the best interests of these children.

C. In Camera Hearing

West Virginia Code § 49-6-5(a)(6)(C) (2011) provides that a court "shall give consideration to the wishes of a child fourteen years of age or older or otherwise of an age of discretion as determined by the court regarding the permanent termination of parental rights." This Court has addressed that statutory requirement and has acknowledged that the wishes of such a child must be considered prior to a determination on the termination of parental rights.[6] In In re Jessica G., 226 W.Va. 17, 697 S.E.2d 53 (2010), the thirteen-year-old child did not want her father's parental rights terminated. This Court found as follows:

> After reviewing the circuit court's order terminating the Appellant's parental and custodial rights, as well as a review of the transcript of the dispositional hearing, we find that the circuit court failed to adequately explain why Jessica G.'s, who was thirteen years old at the time of the dispositional hearing (and is now fourteen years old), was not "otherwise of an age of discretion," Id., and why her wishes were not factored into whether termination of the Appellant's parental rights, and the concomitant bond between Jessica G. and her father, might be contrary to Jessica G.'s best interest and emotional well-being.

Jessica G., 226 W.Va. at 22, 697 S.E.2d at 58; see also In re Ashton M., 228 W.Va. 584, 723 S.E.2d 409 (2012).

[6]As this Court explained in Edward B.,

> As this most important area of the law has expanded, this Court has insisted that the directives of applicable rules and legislative enactments must be carefully identified, respected, and incorporated within our court system. The Rules of Procedure for Child Abuse and Neglect Proceedings and the related statutes detailing fair, prompt, and thorough procedures for child abuse and neglect cases are not mere general guidance; rather, they are stated in mandatory terms and vest carefully described and circumscribed discretion in our courts, intended to protect the due process rights of the parents as well as the rights of the innocent children.

In the present case, the two oldest children were aged fourteen or older, and counsel for Petitioner had allegedly advised the lower court that those two older children had indicated their desire to inform the court about the specific conduct of their father. The lower court, relying upon the arguments of the DHHR and the guardian ad litem regarding the contention that the children might suffer emotional harm by testifying, determined that an in camera hearing was not necessary. Thus, the lower court refused to conduct an in camera hearing with these children, considered only the representations of counsel, and took no further action to ascertain the specific wishes of the children.

Based upon the requirement of West Virginia Code § 49-6-5(a)(6)(C) and the expression of the desire of these children to speak with the trial court, this Court finds that the trial court should have provided a meaningful opportunity for these children to express their concerns with regard to the conditions of abuse and neglect allegedly existing within their home, as well as their wishes regarding the termination of their father's parental rights. On remand, the trial court is directed to determine the most appropriate manner in which these two children may make their wishes known to the court.

D. Dismissal of John W.'s Younger Two Children Residing in Maryland

Petitioner contends that the lower court erred by dismissing the younger two children, S.W. and J.W., from this abuse and neglect action. She argues that the trial court was presented with a DHHR petition regarding the alleged abuse and neglect of all four children and should have addressed the issues raised with regard to all four of those children. She further contends that the lower court erred in assuming that the Maryland divorce court would address issues relating to these younger two children. No referral had been made to Maryland Child Protective Services personnel, and Maryland had already stayed its divorce proceedings awaiting a West Virginia decision on the abuse and neglect matter.

Upon review by this Court, we find that the lower court abused its discretion by dismissing the two children residing in Maryland and, as explained above, in failing to hold a hearing regarding the abuse and neglect issues involving those children. Those two children, although residing primarily with their mother in Maryland, had exercised visitation with their father in West Virginia and had also allegedly been the victims of the conditions of abuse or neglect referenced in the DHHR petition. The lower court did not have the benefit of a guardian ad litem report regarding these children, heard no testimony regarding these children, and ultimately dismissed these children from this abuse and neglect case without testimonial evidence regarding the alleged abuse and neglect they suffered or a finding regarding their best interests. This ruling was a clear abuse of discretion.

IV. Conclusion

Based upon this Court's thorough review of this matter and for the foregoing reasons, the order of the Circuit Court of Berkeley County accepting John W.'s voluntary relinquishment of parental rights and dismissing the abuse and neglect petition with regard to S.W. and J.W. is hereby vacated. Furthermore, this case is remanded to the Circuit Court of Berkeley County for the appointment of a guardian ad litem for S.W. and J.W. and for an additional evidentiary hearing consistent with this opinion.

Vacated and Remanded with Directions.

J. David Judy, III, for appellant.

Karen L. Garrett, Moorefield, guardian ad litem for children.

PER CURIAM:
Tammy B. is the natural mother of three infant children: Cynthia D. ("Cindy"), born out of wedlock on September 10, 1979, William B., Jr. ("Willie") born to the union of Tammy B. and William B., Sr. on July 14, 1980 and Paul L., born on April 21, 1985 during the marriage of Tammy B. and William B., Sr. but with Roger L. named as father. See footnote 1 As a result of a child abuse and neglect proceeding, Tammy B.'s parental rights were terminated. See footnote 2 On appeal to this Court, Tammy B. argues that she failed to receive personal notice of the hearing on the removal petition, the judgment is not supported by the evidence, the trial court failed to allow a meaningful improvement period, and the trial court failed to adopt the least restrictive alternative.

Throughout the proceedings below, Tammy B. lived with Roger L., although she was married to William B., Sr. Between October 21, 1983 and March 20, 1984, the Department of Human Services investigated four separate incidents of domestic violence between Tammy B. and Roger L. Two of these instances of domestic violence resulted in injury to Cindy. On November 4, 1983 Cindy was cut by flying glass and on March 20, 1984, Cindy was struck in the face with a shovel by Roger L. See footnote 3 During this period, DHS received other reports that the children were left unattended or taken to bars late at night.

On July 26, 1985 Sandra Jones, a case worker for DHS, investigating a report that Roger L. had choked Willie, found Willie had stitches in his head. Both Tammy B. and Roger L. denied that Willie had been choked and said that Willie had fallen from a swing.

On August 6, 1985, Tammy B. reported to DHS that Roger L. threw her through a door and she had left him. DHS offered her protective services which were refused. Shortly thereafter, Tammy B. returned with her children to Roger L. On August 26, 1985, DHS received another report of domestic violence which Tammy B. denied.

At 3:00 a.m. on October 11, 1985, Tammy B. called the state police and requested help to leave Roger L. The state police drove Tammy B. and the children to the home of Tammy's mother. Tammy B. refused to file charges and called Mrs. B., Willie's grandmother, to pick up Willie and Cindy. When Mrs. B. arrived to get the children, Tammy B. and the children had already returned to Roger L.

Because of the ongoing nature of the endangerment to the children, on October 21, 1985, DHS filed a petition with the Circuit Court of Hardy County charging Tammy B. with abuse and neglect of the infant children. A hearing was scheduled for November 7, 1985 on the petition and Tammy B. was personally served. The hearing was rescheduled for November 19, 1985 and Tammy B. was notified by mail.

On November 19, 1985 although Tammy B. did not appear, the trial court heard testimony and found that the children, then 5 and 6 years old, were engaging in inappropriate sexual activity, and that the domestic violence affected the children sufficiently adversely to warrant their immediate removal. The children were removed immediately and placed in the physical and legal custody of DHS. Cindy and Willie were placed with Willie's grandmother, Mrs. B., and the infant, Paul L., was placed in foster care.

On November 21, 1985, counsel for Tammy B. filed a petition to reopen the hearing and various motions, including a motion to disqualify the Honorable John M. Hamilton which was ultimately rejected by this Court by letter opinion dated December 19, 1985.

After the removal, Tammy B. began to work with DHS and a service plan was composed in early January 1986, signed by counsel for Tammy B. on January 16, 1986 and signed by Tammy B. on February 4, 1986. The family case plan was revised and signed on April 30, 1986. Between January 1986 and July 10, 1986, numerous visits were arranged between the children and Tammy B. Tammy B. completed DHS's parenting skills class, had a psychological evaluation and attended counseling on the basic causes of abuse and neglect. On July 8, 1986 the counselor, Dr. Bailey, recommended family counseling and requested the children be returned home to facilitate counseling. The circuit court ordered the return of the two children to facilitate family counseling pursuant to the family service plan and to avoid having Cindy change schools. Two children were returned; Paul L., on July 10, 1986 and Cindy, on August 25, 1986. Willie remained with his grandmother and legal custody of all the children remained with DHS.

Problems developed immediately. Although DHS explained to Tammy B. the school's requirement of a "tine test" and had offered to provide transportation, Cindy did not attend the first few days of school because she lacked the test. About 10:30 p.m. on September 8, 1986, Tammy B. took both children to the parking lot of the Friendly Tavern looking for Roger L. When a woman who Tammy B. thought had been with Roger L. emerged from the tavern, a violent disagreement ensued between the women. Both Cindy and Paul were left alone in the car and watched the fight. As a result Tammy B. left Roger L. but shortly thereafter, she began to help him clean a trailer during the day.

On September 29, 1986, "Squirrel" S., an acquaintance of Roger L., entered the trailer when no one was home and passed out on the floor. When Tammy B., Roger L. and the children entered the trailer, they found Squirrel and, because they could not awaken him, they left him in the trailer and went outside to clean up the yard. Later, as dinner was being served, two DHS workers accompanied by a deputy sheriff, arrived. Just then Squirrel appeared from the back of the trailer and asked for a beer. After a brief disturbance, DHS removed both children. After a hearing held on January 15 and 16, 1987 the circuit court ordered the termination Tammy B.'s parental rights.

Because of the constitutional protections surrounding the right of a natural parent to the custody of her infant children, notice of the petition and hearing to terminate those rights is required. In our recent examination of parental rights, we stated in Syllabus Point 1, In Interest of Betty J.W., 179 W.Va. 605, 371 S.E.2d 326 (1988):

> In the law concerning custody of minor children, no rule is more firmly established than the right of a natural parent to the custody of his or her infant child is paramount to that of any other person; it is a fundamental personal liberty protected and guaranteed by the Due Process Clauses of the West Virginia and United States Constitutions. Syllabus Point 1, In re Willis, 157 W.Va. 225, 207 S.E.2d 129 (1973).

W.Va.Code, 49-6-1(b) [1977] indicates that personal service of the termination petition and notice of the hearing is preferred but not required. See footnote 4

In the present case Tammy B. was personally served on October 22, 1985 with a copy of the petition and a notice of hearing scheduled for 9:00 a.m. November 7, 1985. The hearing was continued to 1:00 p.m. November 19, 1985 and an amended notice of hearing was sent by first class mail to Tammy B. On appeal Tammy B. contends that she did not receive the amended notice and, therefore, the circuit court had no right to conduct a hearing in her absence.

Even though Tammy B. did not receive the amended notice of hearing, the personal service of the petition and original notice of hearing meets both due process and statutory notice requirements. If Tammy B. had appeared or even inquired on November 7, 1985, the original hearing date, she would have been informed of the continuance. We find that the personal service of the petition and notice of original hearing to Tammy B. meets both due process and statutory notice requirements.

II

W.Va.Code, 49-6-2(c) [1984] requires that in a child abuse or neglect case, the Department of Human Services is to prove that the "conditions existing at the time of the filing of the petition ... by clear and convincing proof." In Syllabus Point 1, In Interest of S.C., 168 W.Va. 366, 284 S.E.2d 867 (1981), we stated:

> W.Va.Code, 49-6-2(c) [1980], requires the State Department of Welfare, in a child abuse or neglect case, to prove "conditions existing at the time of the filing of the petition ... by clear and convincing proof." The statute, however, does not specify any particular manner or mode of testimony or evidence by which the State Department of Welfare is obligated to meet this burden.

The burden of proof remains with DHS through any improvement period. In Syllabus Point 2, In Interest of S.C., 168 W.Va. 366, 284 S.E.2d 867 (1981), we stated:

> Even when an improvement period is granted, the burden of proof in a child neglect or abuse case does not shift from the State Department of Welfare to the parent, guardian or custodian of the child. It remains upon the State Department of Welfare throughout the proceedings.

In the present case, DHS presented evidence of child abuse and neglect in the November 19, 1985 hearing through a report dated September 25, 1985 and testimony from law enforcement officers who had investigated the incidents of domestic violence, Mrs. B., Willie's grandmother, and Sandra Jones, a child protective services worker. The testimony was subject to cross-examination by the guardian ad litem for the children. We find that the court's finding of November 19, 1985 that the children were abused and that an immediate danger was present to their safety and welfare was supported by clear and convincing proof.

The court order terminating Tammy B.'s parental rights was based on Tammy B.'s failure to continue to implement the family service plan after the two children were returned. The record indicates that Cindy missed school, and that Cindy and Paul were left unattended in a tavern parking lot at 10:30 p.m., witnessed a fight between their mother and another woman, were left with inappropriate babysitters, were exposed to drunkenness with the seeming approval of their mother, and continued to experience domestic violence and instability. Counseling on substance abuse stopped and Tammy B. did not conscientiously attend family counseling, even though counseling was the reason for the children's return. See footnote 5 We find that the decision of the circuit court permanently to terminate the parental rights of Tammy B. because she failed to act as a responsible parent for an appreciable period is supported by clear and convincing proof.

Parental rights are protected by the statutory requirement that, in the absence of compelling circumstances to justify a denial, the circuit court, if requested, must allowed a parent an improvement period. See footnote 6 In Syllabus Point 2, State ex rel. Dept. of Human Services v. Cheryl M., 177 W.Va. 688, 356 S.E.2d 181 (1987), we stated:

> W.Va.Code, 49-6-2(b) (1984), perm its a parent to m ove the court for an improvement period which shall be allowed unless the court finds compelling circumstances to justify a denial.

An improvement period can be granted to a parent without custody of her children in order to provide the parent with an opportunity to overcome the perceived problems. In Syllabus Point 2, In Interest of Betty J.W., 179 W.Va. 605, 371 S.E.2d 326 (1988), we stated:

> W.Va.Code, 49-6-2(b) (1984), allows a parental improvement period, while the child is tem porarily physically rem oved from the alleged abusive situation, as the court m ay require tem porary custody in the state department or other agency during the improvement period.

See State v. Scritchfield, 167 W.Va. 683, 280 S.E.2d 315 (1981).

When an improvement period is ordered, the Department of Human Services is required to prepare a family case plan. Cheryl M., supra, 177 W.Va. at 688, 356 S.E.2d at 181. W.Va.Code, 49-6D-3(a) [1984] requires the family problems be identified in an organized and realistic manner and that logical goals be set to resolve or lessen those problems. See footnote 7 W.Va.Code, 49- 6D-3(b) [1984] provides that the plan should result from input by the parent, the child, if appropriate, counsel for the participants and DHS. The plan should be furnished to the court with thirty days after entry of the order referring the case to DHS. Id.

We recognized the purpose of the family case plan in Syllabus Point 5, State ex rel. Dept. of Human Services v. Cheryl M., 177 W.Va. 688, 356 S.E.2d 181 (1987), when we stated:

> The purpose of the family case plan as set out in W.Va.Code, 49-6D- 3(a) (1984), is to clearly set forth an orga nized, realistic m ethod of identifying family problems and the logical steps to be used in resolving or lessening these problems.

In the present case Tammy B. contends that she was denied a meaningful improvement period. The record indicates that although Tammy B. did not request an improvement period, an improvement period was worked out between the parties on December 12, 1985. The improvement period began while the children were in the temporary custody of DHS. A family case plan was developed by early January 1986, signed by all parties, submitted to and approved by the court. See footnote 8 The family case plan substantially met requirements specified in W.Va.Code, 49-6D-3 [1984]. During the plan's first stage the focus of improvement plan was on parenting skills, counseling for substance abuse and reducing domestic violence in order to achieve the goal of returning the children. After the children were returned, the focus of the improvement plan was on family counseling. However, after the return of the two children, improvement under the plan stopped. See footnote 9 The improvement period granted to Tammy B. met the statutory requirements and clearly was an opportunity for Tammy B. to alleviate the perceived problems.

We find that Tammy B. had a meaningful improvement period with a family case plan and that during the improvement period Tammy B. failed to act as a responsible parent.

Finally Tammy B. contends that the trial court failed to allow the least restrictive alternative regarding her rights as a natural parent. Tammy B.'s reliance on the least restrictive preference prescribed in W.Va.Code, 49-6-5(a) [1984] is misplaced.

In Syllabus Point 1 of In re R.J.M., 164 W.Va. 496, 266 S.E.2d 114 (1980) we held:

> As a general rule the least restrictive alternative regarding parental rights to custody of a child under W.Va.Code, 49-6-5 [1977] will be employed; however, courts are not required to exhaust every speculative possibility of parental improvement before terminating parental rights where it appears that the welfare of the child will be seriously threatened, and this is particularly applicable to children under the age of three years who are more susceptible to illness, need consistent close interaction with fully committed adults, and are likely to have their emotional and physical development retarded by numerous placements.

See also In Interest of Darla B., 175 W.Va. 137, 331 S.E.2d 868 (1985). In the present case the children were repeatedly exposed to violent domestic arguments, were cut by flying glass, were choked, and were hit on the head with a shovel. Further, the children were reported to have been exposed to sexual acts in the home with the result that the older children were engaging in inappropriate sexual activity. Cindy was reported to have been sexually abused or exploited by Roger L. and William B., Sr., each of whom denied the allegation.

Given this violent history the circuit court's order of November 19, 1985 gave preference to the least restrictive alternative when it placed the children in the temporary custody of DHS, attempted an improvement period and later even returned two of the children.

However, the return of the children coincided with Tammy B.'s failure to continue the behavior specified in the family case plan. In Syllabus Point 2, In Re R.J.M., 164 W.Va. 496, 266 S.E.2d 114 (1980), we stated:

> Termination of parental rights, the most drastic remedy under the statutory provision covering the disposition of neglected children, W.Va.Code, 49-6-5 [1977] may be employed without the use of intervening less restrictive alternatives when it is found that there is no reasonable likelihood under W.Va.Code, 49-6-5(b) [1977] that conditions of neglect or abuse can be substantially corrected.

W.Va.Code, 49-6-5(b) [1984] describes six non-exclusive circumstances that demonstrate there is no reasonable likelihood that the conditions of neglect or abuse can be substantially corrected. In the present case, the circuit court found two such circumstances: (1) Tammy B. refused to cooperate in developing a family case plan before the filing of the petition, (W.Va.Code, 49-6- 5(b)(2) [1984]), and (2) Tammy B. did not follow through with reasonable rehabilitative efforts, (W.Va.Code, 49-6-5(b)(3) [1984]). See footnote 10

We find that the circuit court's termination of the parental rights of Tammy B. was based upon clear and convincing proof that there was "no likelihood that the conditions of neglect or abuse can be substantially corrected in the near future." W.Va.Code, 49-6-5(a) [1984].

In her appeal Tammy B. requests that she be given an improvement period with a family case plan directed at reuniting the family. Because Tammy B. has been given a meaningful improvement period, we find that this case presents "compelling circumstances to justify a denial" of an additional improvement period within the meaning of W.Va.Code, 49-6- 2(b) [1984] and hereby affirm the decision of the circuit court.

AFFIRMED.

Footnote: 1 We follow our past practice in juvenile and domestic relations cases that involve sensitive facts by not using the last names of the parties. See e.g. State ex rel. Dept. of Human Services v. Cheryl M., 177 W.Va. 688 n. 1, 356 S.E.2d 181 n. 1 (1987);

Footnote: 2 Although the same proceeding terminated the parental rights of David W., the alleged father of Cindy, and the parental rights of Roger L., neither have appealed to this Court. The parental rights of William B., Sr. were not terminated and Willie was placed in the temporary custody of the Department of Human Services.

Footnote: 3 A deputy sheriff testified about the November 4, 1983 incident and a state trooper testified about the March 20, 1984 incident.

Footnote: 4 W.Va.Code, 49-6-1(b) [1977] states in pertinent part:
The petition and notice of the hearing shall be served upon both parents and any other custodian, giving to such parents or custodian at least ten days' notice, and notice shall be given to the state department. In case wherein personal service within West Virginia cannot be obtained after due diligence upon any parent or other custodian, a copy of the petition and notice of the hearing shall be mailed to such person by certified mail, addressee only, return receipt requested, to the last known address of such person.

Footnote: 5 The record indicates that in the approximate one month period when both children were in the home, Tammy B. kept two of the weekly family counseling appointments. Tammy B. saw Dr. Bailey on October 1 and 21, 1986, but Dr. Bailey discontinued the sessions because Tammy B. did not attempt to deal with her own problems. Although encouraged by DHS to seek counseling, Tammy B. had no other counseling. The substance abuse counseling was discontinued in July 1986.

Footnote: 6 W.Va.Code, 49-6-2(b) [1984] provides:
In any proceeding under this article, the parents or custodians may, prior to final hearing, move to be allowed an improvement period of three to twelve months in order to remedy the circumstances or alleged circumstances upon which the proceeding is based. The court shall allow one such improvement period unless it finds compelling circumstances to justify a denial thereof, but may require temporary custody in the state department or other agency during the improvement period. An order granting such improvement period shall require the department to prepare and submit to the court a family case plan in accordance with the provisions of section three [§ 49-6D-3], article six-D of this chapter.

Footnote: 7 W.Va.Code, 49-6D-3(a) [1984] requires each family case plan to contain the following:
(1) A listing of specific, measurable, realistic goals to be achieved;
(2) An arrangement of goals into an order of priority;
(3) A listing of the problems that will be addressed by each goal;

(4) A specific description of how the assigned caseworker or caseworkers and the abusing parent, guardian or custodian will achieve each goal;
(5) A description of the departmental and community resources to be used in implementing the proposed actions and services;
(6) A list of the services which will be provided;
(7) Time targets for the achievement of goals or portions of goals;
(8) An assignment of tasks to the abusing or neglecting parent, guardian or custodian, to the caseworker or caseworkers, and to other participants in the planning process; and
(9) A designation of when and how often tasks will be performed.

Footnote: 8 The family service plan was filed with the circuit court on February 6, 1986. The delay in filing was caused by Tammy B.'s motion to disqualify the circuit court judge and because Tammy B. did not wish to sign the plan until her attorney had signed. The revised service plan of April 1986 and DHS's monthly reports were filed with the court.

Footnote: 9 W.Va.Code, 49-6-2(b) [1984] specifies that the improvement period last for three to twelve months. The actual improvement period for Tammy B. began in December 1985 although the court's adoption of the family case plan was not formally reflected until the July 10, 1986 order.

Footnote: 10 W.Va.Code, 49-6-5(b)(2) [1984] provides:
(2) The abusing parent or parents have willfully refused or are presently unwilling to cooperate in the development of a reasonable family case plan designed to lead to the child's return to their care, custody and control.
W.Va.Code, 49-6-5(b)(3) [1984] provides:
(3) The abusing parent or parents have not responded to or followed through with a reasonable family case plan or other rehabilitative efforts of social, medical, mental health or other rehabilitative agencies designed to reduce or prevent the abuse or neglect of the child, as evidenced by the continuation or insubstantial diminution of conditions which threatened the health, welfare or life of the child.

Supreme Court Of Appeals Of West Virginia

IN THE MATTER OF: TAYLOR B.

Submitted: June 3, 1997
Filed: July 14, 1997

SYLLABUS BY THE COURT

1. "In civil abuse and neglect cases, the legislature has made DHHR the State's representative. In litigations that are conducted under State civil abuse and neglect statutes, DHHR is the client of county prosecutors. The legislature has specifically indicated through W.Va. Code, sec. 49-6-10 (1996) that prosecutors must cooperate with DHHR's efforts to pursue civil abuse and neglect actions. The relationship between DHHR and county prosecutors under the statute is a pure attorney-client relationship. The legislature has not given authority to county prosecutors to litigate civil abuse and neglect actions independent of DHHR. Such authority is granted to prosecutors only under State criminal abuse and neglect statutes. Therefore, all of the legal and ethical principles that govern the attorney-client relationship in general, are applicable to the relationship that exists between DHHR and county prosecutors in civil abuse and neglect proceedings." Syl. pt. 4, State ex rel. Diva P. v. Kaufman, No. 23928, ___ W. Va. ___, ___ S.E.2d ___ (July 11, 1997).

2. A civil child abuse and neglect petition instituted by the West Virginia Department of Health and Human Resources pursuant to W. Va. Code, 49-6-1 [1992], et seq., is not subject to dismissal pursuant to the terms of a plea bargain between a county prosecutor and a criminal defendant in a related child abuse prosecution.

3. "Although parents have substantial rights that must be protected, the primary goal in cases involving abuse and neglect, as in all family law matters, must be the health and welfare of the children." Syl. pt. 3, In re Katie S., 198 W. Va. 79, 479 S.E.2d 589 (1996).

4. "Although conclusions of law reached by a circuit court are subject to de novo review, when an action, such as an abuse and neglect case, is tried upon the facts without a jury, the circuit court shall make a determination based upon the evidence and shall make findings of fact and conclusions of law as to whether such child is abused or neglected. These findings shall not be set aside by a reviewing court unless clearly erroneous. A finding is clearly erroneous when, although there is evidence to support the finding, the reviewing court on the entire evidence is left with the definite and firm conviction that a mistake has been committed. However, a reviewing court may not overturn a finding simply because it would have decided the case differently, and it must affirm a finding if the circuit court's account of the evidence is plausible in light of the record viewed in its entirety." Syl. pt. 1, In the Interest of : Tiffany Marie S., 196 W Va. 223, 470 S.E.2d 177 (1996).

5. "Parental rights may be terminated where there is clear and convincing evidence that the infant child has suffered extensive physical abuse while in the custody of his or her parents, and there is no reasonable likelihood that the conditions of abuse can be substantially corrected because the perpetrator of the abuse has not been identified and the parents, even in the face of knowledge of the abuse, have taken no action to identify the abuser." Syl. pt. 3, In re Jeffrey R.L., 190 W. Va. 24, 435 S.E.2d 162 (1993).

6. "Termination of parental rights of a parent of an abused child is authorized under W.Va. Code, 49-6-1 to 49-6-10, as amended, where such parent contends nonparticipation in the acts giving rise to the termination petition but there is clear and convincing evidence that such nonparticipating parent knowingly took no action to prevent or stop such acts to protect the child. Furthermore, termination of parental rights of a parent of an abused child is authorized under W.Va. Code, 49-6-1 to 49-6-10, as amended, where such nonparticipating parent supports the other parent's version as to how a child's injuries occurred, but there is clear and convincing evidence that such version is inconsistent with the medical evidence." Syl. pt. 2, In the Matter of Scottie D., 185 W Va. 191, 406 S.E.2d 214 (1991).

7. "When parental rights are terminated due to neglect or abuse, the circuit court may nevertheless in appropriate cases consider whether continued visitation or other contact with the abusing parent is in the best interest of the child. Among other things, the circuit court should consider whether a close emotional bond has been established between parent and child and the child's wishes, if he or she is of appropriate maturity to make such request. The evidence must indicate that such visitation or continued contact would not be detrimental to the child's well being and would be in the child's best interest." McHugh, Justice:
This case is before this Court upon appeal from the final order of the Circuit Court of Tucker County, West Virginia, entered on March 12, 1996. This is a child abuse and neglect matter concerning injuries suffered by Taylor B., a three-month-old infant, while in the care of his parents, James B. and Regina B. See footnote 1 According to the West Virginia Department of Health and Human Services, the injuries were consistent with "shaken baby syndrome," and the rights of the parents should have been terminated. However, as the final order indicates, the circuit court concluded that, although the injuries to Taylor B. "could have" been caused by James B., the parents have since been educated concerning shaken baby syndrome and that, therefore, a termination of parental rights was not warranted.

This Court has before it the petition for appeal, all matters of record and the briefs and argument of counsel. Upon a careful review of the record, and for the reasons expressed below, this Court is of the opinion that the circuit court committed error in failing to terminate the parental rights of James B. and Regina B. to Taylor B. We reach this conclusion in view of clear and convincing proof that the injuries to Taylor B. were, in fact, consistent with shaken baby syndrome and incurred while in the sole presence of James B., that the explanations of the parents to the contrary were inconsistent with the medical evidence, and that the parents have failed to acknowledge that any abuse or neglect of Taylor B. occurred.

Accordingly, we reverse the final order and remand this case to the circuit court for the entry of an order (1) terminating the parental rights of James B. and Regina B. to Taylor B., (2) directing the Department of Health and Human Resources to develop a permanency plan under the provisions of W. Va. Code, 49-6-5 [1996], for the permanent placement of Taylor B. in another home and (3) granting the parents supervised visitation. In so ruling, this Court is not unmindful that Taylor B. is now 3 years of age and has continued to reside with James B. and Regina B. throughout this litigation. We, therefore, further order the circuit court to explore, with the assistance of the parties, the possibility of the permanent placement of Taylor B. with a family relative of the parents. In the event the possibility of such placement with a family relative is confirmed, the Department shall develop a plan for the removal of Taylor B. from the home of James B. and Regina B. upon a progressive basis, subject to monitoring by the Department of Taylor B.'s safety.

I

The facts in this case are disturbing. Regina B. and James B., her male companion, lived in a home near Parsons, West Virginia, in Tucker County. See footnote 2 Taylor B., born on January 23, 1994, is the sole child of the relationship. On May 4, 1994, Regina B., upon leaving her employment for the day, picked up Taylor B. at her mother's house and returned home. Upon her arrival, James B. asked her to go back to her mother's house, which was across the road, to borrow a vacuum cleaner. Regina B. placed Taylor B., then three months old, in a baby swing and left to get the vacuum cleaner. When she returned approximately five minutes later she found Taylor B. lying on the floor, limp and unresponsive. James B., who had been alone with Taylor B. during that time, told Regina B. that he had placed Taylor B. upon the couch and that, while he was working in another area of the home, Taylor B. had fallen to the floor. The couch seat was approximately 12 inches from the floor, and a coffee table was nearby. The floor was carpeted.

James B. and Regina B. immediately sought medical treatment for Taylor B. at the Tucker County Emergency Ambulatory Center and later at Davis Memorial Hospital in Elkins, West Virginia. Soon after, Taylor B. was admitted at Ruby Memorial Hospital in Morgantown, West Virginia. Taylor B. remained at the latter hospital until his discharge on May 11, 1994.

As stated on the discharge summary from Ruby Memorial Hospital, Taylor B. was diagnosed with a subdural hematoma, "interhemispheric blood," and retinal hemorrhages, as a result of the incident. In particular, Dr. Susan A. Schmitt, who treated Taylor B. at the Emergency Ambulatory Center, later testified that Taylor B. was in "grave danger" on May 4, 1994, and was suffering from shaken baby syndrome. Moreover, Dr. Schmitt testified that she did not believe that Taylor B. had sustained the injuries from falling off a couch. See footnote 3 In addition, Dr. John B. Bodensteiner, a pediatric neurologist who examined Taylor B. at Ruby Memorial Hospital, testified that, as a result of the incident, Taylor B. sustained a subdural hematoma and retinal hemorrhages, consistent with shaken baby syndrome. Moreover, as did Dr. Schmitt, Dr. Bodensteiner stated that the injuries Taylor B. sustained were inconsistent with a fall from a couch. See footnote 4 Upon his discharge from Ruby Memorial Hospital, the Department of Health and Human Resources obtained emergency custody of Taylor B., and a petition seeking the termination of the parental rights of James B. and Regina B. was filed. W. Va. Code, 49-6-1 [1992]. At about that time, James B. moved out of the parties' Tucker County residence. On May 17, 1994, the circuit court conducted a preliminary hearing, at the conclusion of which an order was entered returning Taylor B. to Regina B. In addition, James B. was granted supervised visitation. Subsequently, the circuit court entered an order granting Regina B. an improvement period.

In October 1994, the Department of Health and Human Resources completed a written family case plan, applicable to both parents, to assist the parties and the circuit court in the ultimate disposition of the case. W. Va. Code, 49-6-2 [1992]. The plan required, in part, an acknowledgment by James B. and Regina B. of any "conditions and circumstances" relevant to the safety and well-being of Taylor B. However, although they subsequently attended parenting classes concerning their child, both James B. and Regina B. refused to sign the family case plan. In fact, the parents have never stated or recognized that any abuse or neglect of Taylor B. occurred. Specifically, James B. asserted that, the medical evidence notwithstanding, he never shook or harmed Taylor B. in any way on May 4, 1994, or at any other time. Moreover, Regina B., although conceding that Taylor B. was seriously injured on May 4, asserted that James B. was not responsible for the injuries, "because that's what he told me."

In addition to the abuse and neglect petition filed against James B. and Regina B. by the Department of Health and Human Resources, criminal proceedings were instituted against James B. by the Tucker County prosecuting attorney concerning the incident of May 4, 1994. On March 29, 1995, the criminal proceeding was resolved upon James B.'s plea of nolo contendere to the misdemeanor offense of presenting false information to attending medical personnel. W. Va. Code, 61-8D-7 [1988]. See footnote 5 According to James B. and the prosecuting attorney (who was representing the State in the criminal proceeding and the Department in the abuse and neglect proceeding), the nolo contendere plea was to result, additionally, in the dismissal of the abuse and neglect proceeding instituted by the Department. Nevertheless, upon objection by both the Department of Health and Human Resources and the guardian ad litem for Taylor B., the circuit court declined to dismiss the abuse and neglect proceeding, and, instead, a special prosecutor was appointed to represent the Department. See footnote 6 Following the nolo contendere plea, however, James B. moved back into the residence of Regina B. and Taylor B.

On August 31, 1995, the circuit court conducted an evidentiary hearing upon the abuse and neglect petition. The evidence of the Department consisted, chiefly, of establishing that, in spite of medical evidence to the contrary, neither James B. nor Regina B. ever acknowledged that any abuse or neglect of Taylor B. occurred. Included in the evidence of the Department was the testimony of two psychologists, Dr. Allan L. LaVoie and Dr. John M. Marstiller, who indicated that, in the absence of recognition by a parent that child abuse has occurred, the child remains at risk.

On the other hand, in addition to denying that any abuse or neglect of Taylor B. had occurred, the evidence of James B. and Regina B. consisted of establishing that they were good parents, that they had successfully completed the parenting classes required by the Department and that they had cooperated with all authorities involved in the case, short of stating that abuse and neglect had taken place.

Following the evidentiary hearing, the circuit court entered the final order of March 12, 1996, returning full custody of Taylor B. to James B. and Regina B. In language, which appears to this Court, however, to be rather uncertain, the circuit court stated:

As to this recent and acute hematoma, there appears sufficient evidence from the expert that this activity seen upon physical examination of the child and from the CT testing done, is a circumstance of 'Shaken-Impact Syndrome' applicable to infants. . . . This father, in handling this fussy child, could have taken him out of the swing, could have violently pushed him against the soft back of the couch, or put him violently down on the soft cushion of the couch seat. This activity could have resulted in the physical damage to the child, with the subdural hematoma and the bilateral retinal hemorrhages in the eyes. . . . Considering these presenting circumstances, the father and mother of this infant, together with the maternal grandmother, took all necessary action to obtain medical assistance . . . . The clearer and more convincing evidence adduced at the hearing is the knowledge that both the parents, with knowledge that one of them took certain actions which precipitated the mental and physical condition of the child, have now been educated as to what caused the damage.

II

As a preliminary matter, this Court notes that, in response to the petition for appeal of the Department of Health and Human Resources, James B. asserts that the abuse and neglect petition filed against him and Regina B. should have been dismissed as a part of his nolo contendere plea to the offense of presenting false information to attending medical personnel. According to James B. that misdemeanor conviction resulted from a plea bargain, part of which included a promise by the prosecuting attorney to terminate the abuse and neglect proceeding. This Court concludes, however, that James B.'s assertion is without merit.

In the case of In re Jonathan G., ___ W. Va. ___, 482 S.E.2d 893 (1996), this Court recognized the dual role of county prosecutors "in the area of civil/criminal abuse and neglect cases." Citing the provisions of W. Va. Code, 49-6-10 [1984], which requires prosecuting attorneys to "fully and promptly cooperate" with those seeking relief in child abuse and neglect matters, we stated in that case that "the prosecuting attorney stands in the traditional role of a lawyer when representing DHHR in connection with abuse and neglect proceedings." ___ W. Va. at ___, 482 S.E.2d at 909. Thus, observing that the prosecutor's authority is more limited within the civil arena of abuse and neglect proceedings, as compared to the criminal side of such proceedings, the opinion, in In re Jonathan G., holds: "Based on our conclusion that the prosecuting attorney's role as related to DHHR in an abuse and neglect proceeding is that of a traditional attorney-client, we further determine that a prosecuting attorney has no independent right to formulate and advocate positions separate from its client in these cases." ___ W. Va. at ___, 482 S.E.2d at 909.

The above principle thus expressed in In re Jonathan G. comports with the recent decision of this Court in State ex rel. Diva P. v. Kaufman, No. 23928, ___ W. Va. ___, ___ S.E.2d ___ (July 11, 1997). In State ex rel. Diva P., we stated in syllabus point 4:

> In civil abuse and neglect cases, the legislature has made DHHR the State's representative. In litigations that are conducted under State civil abuse and neglect statutes, DHHR is the client of county prosecutors. The legislature has specifically indicated through W.Va. Code, § 49-6-10 (1996) that prosecutors must cooperate with DHHR's efforts to pursue civil abuse and neglect actions. The relationship between DHHR and county prosecutors under the statute is a pure attorney-client relationship. The legislature has not given authority to county prosecutors to litigate civil abuse and neglect actions independent of DHHR. Such authority is granted to prosecutors only under State criminal abuse and neglect statutes. Therefore, all of the legal and ethical principles that govern the attorney-client relationship in general, are applicable to the relationship that exists between DHHR and county prosecutors in civil abuse and neglect proceedings.

In the framework of In re Jonathan G. and State ex rel. Diva P., it is, therefore, clear that the circuit court, in this case, ruled correctly in declining to dismiss the abuse and neglect petition against James B. and Regina B. and in appointing a special prosecutor to represent the Department. Accordingly, as a corollary to those cases, this Court holds that a civil child abuse and neglect petition instituted by the West Virginia Department of Health and Human Resources pursuant to W. Va. Code, 49-6-1 [1992], et seq., is not subject to dismissal pursuant to the terms of a plea bargain between a county prosecutor and a criminal defendant in a related child abuse prosecution. Contrary to the assertion of James B., civil abuse and neglect proceedings focus directly upon the safety and well-being of the child and are not simply "companion cases" to criminal prosecutions. As this Court stated in syllabus point 3 of In re Katie S., 198 W.Va. 79, 479 S.E.2d 589 (1996): "Although parents have substantial rights that must be protected, the primary goal in cases involving abuse and neglect, as in all family law matters, must be the health and welfare of the children." Here, the circuit court quite properly stated: "I still am not going to accept the plea bargain agreement in this civil case. At this time, I'm finding it is in the best interest of the child that I proceed [.]"

III

In this case, the Department of Health and Human Resources and the guardian ad litem for Taylor B., contend that the circuit court committed error in not terminating the parental rights of James B. and Regina B. According to the Department and the guardian ad litem, the evidence established that Taylor B. was the victim of shaken baby syndrome, a life threatening, nonaccidental circumstance. Moreover, the parents admitted that Taylor B. sustained serious injuries on May 4, 1994, even though they denied any abuse or neglect. In that regard, the Department and the guardian ad litem indicate that the failure of James B. and Regina B. to acknowledge that abuse or neglect occurred, in spite of medical evidence to the contrary, and the parents' refusal to sign the family case plan, erected a barrier to Taylor B's safety. James B., on the other hand, denies abusing or neglecting Taylor B. in any way, and Regina B. supports James B.'s version of the incident in question. In addition, both parents contend that the evidence proved that they were good parents who attended parenting classes and that they cooperated with all authorities involved in the case. Thus, James B. and Regina B. assert that the final order of the circuit court should be affirmed.

In syllabus point 1 of In the Interest of: Tiffany Marie S., 196 W. Va. 223, 470 S.E.2d 177 (1996), this Court observed:

> Although conclusions of law reached by a circuit court are subject to de novo review, when an action, such as an abuse and neglect case, is tried upon the facts without a jury, the circuit court shall make a determination based upon the evidence and shall make findings of fact and conclusions of law as to whether such child is abused or neglected. These findings shall not be set aside by a reviewing court unless clearly erroneous. A finding is clearly erroneous when, although there is evidence to support the finding, the reviewing court on the entire evidence is left with the definite and firm conviction that a mistake has been committed. However, a reviewing court may not overturn a finding simply because it would have decided the case differently, and it must affirm a finding if the circuit court's account of the evidence is plausible in light of the record viewed in its entirety.

See also syl. pt. 1, State ex rel. Virginia M. v. Virgil Eugene S., 197 W.Va. 456, 475 S.E.2d 548 (1996).

An "abused child" is defined in W. Va. Code, 49-1-3 [1994], as a child who is harmed or threatened by "[a] parent, guardian or custodian who knowingly or intentionally inflicts, attempts to inflict or knowingly allows another person to inflict, physical injury or mental or emotional injury, upon the child or another child in the home[.]" See footnote 7 In addition, W. Va. Code, 49-1-3 [1994], defines a "neglected child" as a child who is harmed or threatened "by a present refusal, failure or inability of the child's parent, guardian or custodian to supply the child with necessary food, clothing, shelter, supervision, medical care or education, when such refusal, failure or inability is not due primarily to a lack of financial means on the part of the parent, guardian or custodian [.]"

In particular, with regard to the termination of parental rights, W. Va. Code, 49-6-5(a)(6) [1992], provides that a circuit court may > [u]pon a finding that there is no reasonable likelihood that the conditions of neglect or abuse can be substantially corrected in the near future, and when necessary for the welfare of the child, terminate the parental or custodial rights and/or responsibilities of the abusing parent and commit the child to the permanent sole custody of the nonabusing parent, if there be one, or, if not, to either the permanent guardianship of the state department or a licensed child welfare agency.

Moreover, W.Va. Code, 49-6-5(b) [1992], provides:

> As used in this section, 'no reasonable likelihood that conditions of neglect or abuse can be substantially corrected' shall mean that, based upon the evidence before the court, the abusing adult or adults have demonstrated an inadequate capacity to solve the problems of abuse or neglect, on their own or with help. Such conditions shall be deemed to exist in the following circumstances, which shall not be exclusive:
> (2) The abusing parent or parents have wilfully refused or are presently unwilling to cooperate in the development of a reasonable family case plan designed to lead to the child's return to their care, custody and control [.]

In In re Jeffrey R. L., 190 W.Va. 24, 435 S.E.2d 162 (1993), a guardian ad litem asserted that the circuit court erred in failing to terminate the parental rights to an infant, where the infant had suffered numerous bone fractures, and physicians had diagnosed the infant as suffering from battered child syndrome. Noting that the mother's explanations for the infant's injuries were inconsistent with the medical evidence and that neither the mother nor the father was cooperative with regard to identifying the perpetrator of the injuries, this Court, in In re Jeffrey R. L., agreed with the guardian ad litem and held that there was clear and convincing evidence in the record warranting the termination of parental rights. As syllabus point 3 of Jeffrey R. L. holds:

> Parental rights may be terminated where there is clear and convincing evidence that the infant child has suffered extensive physical abuse while in the custody of his or her parents, and there is no reasonable likelihood that the conditions of abuse can be substantially corrected because the perpetrator of the abuse has not been identified and the parents, even in the face of knowledge of the abuse, have taken no action to identify the abuser.

See W. Va. Code, 49-6-2 [1996], which requires that abuse and neglect must be established by clear and convincing proof; syl. pt. 2, In re Danielle T., 195 W. Va. 530, 466 S.E.2d 189 (1995).

Moreover, as this Court stated in syllabus point 2 of In the Matter of Scottie D., 185 W. Va. 191, 406 S.E.2d 214 (1991):

> Termination of parental rights of a parent of an abused child is authorized under W.Va. Code, 49-6-1 to 49-6-10, as amended, where such parent contends nonparticipation in the acts giving rise to the termination petition but there is clear and convincing evidence that such nonparticipating parent knowingly took no action to prevent or stop such acts to protect the child. Furthermore, termination of parental rights of a parent of an abused child is authorized under W. Va. Code, 49-6-1 to 49-6-10, as amended, where such nonparticipating parent supports the other parent's version as to how a child's injuries occurred, but there is clear and convincing evidence that such version is inconsistent with the medical evidence.

See also syl. pt. 2, In the Interest of Darla B., 175 W. Va. 137, 331 S.E.2d 868 (1985).

In this case, the evidence is clear and convincing that Taylor B. sustained a subdural hematoma, "interhemispheric blood," and retinal hemorrhages, as a result of the incident of May 4, 1994. According to Dr. Schmitt, Taylor B. was in "grave danger" that evening, and neither Dr. Schmitt nor Dr. Bodensteiner was of the opinion that Taylor B. had sustained those injuries from falling off a couch. As the evidence of record and the final order of the circuit court indicate, the injuries

Taylor B. sustained were consistent with shaken baby syndrome. Without question, shaken baby syndrome is life-threatening to an infant. See Doris S., supra, concerning the death of a twenty-two-month old child from shaken baby syndrome. See footnote 8

In spite of the medical evidence, however, James B. denies that any abuse or neglect of Taylor B. occurred, and Regina B. supports James B.'s version of the incident in question. Nevertheless, as Regina B. testified on August 31, 1995:

> Q: You also did not agree or believe or admit that James did it?
> A: No, I did not.
>
> Q. If James, in fact, did this abuse and he continues to live in your home it can happen again, true?
> A: Yes.

In Doris S., supra, this Court stated that, for a parent to remedy the problem of abuse and neglect, "the problem must first be acknowledged." 197 W. Va. at 498, 475 S.E.2d at 874. Here, the medical evidence notwithstanding, James B. and Doris B. deny that any abuse or neglect occurred and have refused to sign the family case plan because of its indication that there may have been "conditions and circumstances" in the home adverse to the safety and well-being of Taylor B. Such conduct on the part of the parents, however, renders those conditions and circumstances untreatable. As Dr. LaVoie and Dr. Marstiller stated, in the absence of recognition by a parent that child abuse has occurred, the child remains at risk. Specifically, Dr. LaVoie testified before the circuit court as follows:

> Q: Even if Regina [B.] had went through parenting classes and counseling if she had not yet acknowledged that abuse had occurred what, who ever the person who did it would she be safe to have this child back?
> A: In my opinion, not.

Upon a careful review of the record, therefore, this Court is of the opinion that the injuries sustained by Taylor B. could not have occurred in the manner testified to by James B. and Regina B. before the circuit court. Rather, as indicated by the medical testimony, the injuries were consistent with shaken baby syndrome, a life-threatening circumstance. Moreover, neither James B. nor Regina B. has ever acknowledged that any abuse or neglect of Taylor B. occurred. Accordingly, this Court concludes that the circuit court committed error in failing to terminate the parental rights of James B. and Regina B.

In syllabus point 5 of In re Christina L., 194 W. Va. 446, 460 S.E.2d 692 (1995), this Court held:

> When parental rights are terminated due to neglect or abuse, the circuit court may nevertheless in appropriate cases consider whether continued visitation or other contact with the abusing parent is in the best interest of the child. Among other things, the circuit court should consider whether a close emotional bond has been established between parent and child and the child's wishes, if he or she is of appropriate maturity to make such request. The evidence must indicate that such visitation or continued contact would not be detrimental to the child's well being and would be in the child's best interest.

See also In re Danielle T., supra, 195 W. Va. at 535, 466 S.E.2d at 194.

Accordingly, upon all of the above, the final order of the Circuit Court of Tucker County, entered on March 12, 1996, is reversed, and this case is remanded to the circuit court for the entry of an order (1) terminating the parental rights of James B. and Regina B. to Taylor B., (2) directing the Department of Health and Human Resources to develop a permanency plan under the provisions of W. Va. Code, 49-6-5 [1996], for the permanent placement of Taylor B. in another home and (3) granting the parents supervised visitation. In so ruling, this Court further orders the circuit court to explore, with the assistance of the parties, the possibility of the permanent placement of Taylor B. with a family relative of the parents. In the event the possibility of such placement with a family relative is confirmed, the Department shall develop a plan for the removal of Taylor B. from the home of James B. and Regina B. upon a progressive basis, subject to monitoring by the Department of Taylor B.'s safety.

Reversed and remanded.

Footnote: 1 We follow our practice in domestic relations cases involving sensitive matters and use initials to identify the parties, rather than full names. In the matter of Jonathan P., 182 W. Va. 302, 303 n. 1, 387 S.E.2d 537, 538 n. 1 (1989).

Footnote: 2 As the brief filed by James B. in this Court indicates, James B. and Regina B. were married subsequent to the events in question. Specifically, the brief of James B. States: "The parties who are now married, were not married at the time but were living together near Seven Islands in Tucker County."

Footnote: 3 During her testimony, Dr. Schmitt stated:
[Taylor B.] was not able to respond, would not look at anything. He was lying very limp on the table with his eyes open but his eyes rolled back and rhythmically moving from left to right. He did not respond to verbal commands. . . . I did a physical exam and found that he had a bulging fontanel which is the soft spot of the head which is indicative of some kind of an intracranial process. It meant that there was increased pressure inside of his brain. I did a physical exam and I was very concerned about this child. . . . [H]e was in danger. If you look at the kinds of injuries that he sustained, thirty percent of these children die, thirty percent of these children are seriously damaged, and only thirty percent of babies that have sustained this kind of an injury have a normal outcome neurologically.

Footnote: 4 It should be noted that, during the medical treatment of Taylor B. following the incident of May 4, 1994, a second, older subdural hematoma was discovered. As in the case of the injuries of May 4, 1994, the cause of the older subdural hematoma was controverted during the proceedings below. Specifically, Dr. Bodensteiner, indicating that the older injury was nonaccidental testified:

Q. In the present case where you have an old injury and a new injury are you able to, to give us an opinion as to whether it's likely that these were accidental or not? Based upon the history you had in this case?

A. Well, the history we have identifies nothing that would account for either of those injuries. So I, I, I can't say whether, I mean, I can say that the history we have doesn't correlate with it. To [injure] a child at this age twice, this badly is, in my opinion, extremely difficult to do accidentally.

On the other hand, James B. and Regina B. asserted that the second, older subdural hematoma could have occurred at Taylor B.'s birth, which had been a difficult birth, or could have been caused by an accidental kick to the head by an older child visiting the home. Nevertheless, Dr. Bodensteiner stated that Taylor B.'s medical history did not suggest that the older subdural hematoma occurred at birth. Moreover, Dr. Bordensteiner indicated that the kick to the head would have had to have been "severe" to produce such an injury.

Footnote: 5 Article 8D of chapter 61 of the West Virginia Code is entitled "Child Abuse," and W. Va. Code, 61-8D-7 [1988], provides:

Any person who presents false information concerning acts or conduct which would constitute an offense under the provisions of this article to attending medical personnel shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and, upon conviction thereof, shall be fined not less than one hundred dollars nor more than one thousand dollars, and shall be confined in the county jail not more than one year.

As the record indicates, James B. was originally charged with a felony offense under W. Va. Code, 61-8D-3 [1992], which statute concerns the infliction of "serious bodily injury" upon a child.

Footnote: 6 It should be noted that, although both the criminal proceeding and the abuse and neglect proceeding were instituted in Tucker county, separate circuit court judges presided in those matters.

Footnote: 7 In syllabus point 7 of West Virginia Department of Health and Human Resources ex rel. Wright v. Doris S., 197 W. Va. 489, 475 S.E.2d 865 (1996), this Court stated that the term "knowingly" as used in W. Va. Code, 49-1-3, "does not require that a parent actually be present at the time the abuse occurs, but rather that the parent was presented with sufficient facts from which he/she could have and should have recognized that abuse has occurred."

Footnote: 8 The following statement found in the brief filed by James B. in this Court raises concern:

Dr. Boyd, a pediatrician, testified that the child at the time of the hearing, age 19 months, was not susceptible to 'Shaken Baby Syndrome' because he now had better head control. Obviously, the child is now 3 years old and is even less susceptible to this type of injury than that at the time of the hearing.

At best, that statement provides nothing of value with regard to whether Taylor B. was, or may yet be, the victim of abuse or neglect.

Workman, Chief Justice, concurring:

The opinion of the majority is well-written and absolutely correct on the law. I find the result sufficiently troubling, however, that I feel compelled to write separately. What the opinion does not reflect is that these parents were almost encouraged by the policy of the circuit court in this abuse and neglect case not to acknowledge responsibility for the abuse that occurred to Taylor. The lower court in its final order made this finding:

> This Court would come to the legal conclusion that there is no clear and convincing evidence to support the facts that these parents, or either of them, in the face of knowledge of this abuse, took no action or did not identify the perpetrator of this abuse, or are knowingly hiding the identity of the abuser, or are otherwise actually aiding and protecting the abusing parent. The clearer and more convincing evidence adduced at the hearing is the knowledge that both the parents, with knowledge that one of them took certain actions which precipitated the mental and physical condition of the child, have now been educated as to what caused the damage.

Although the court's obvious mistake of clear law in this regard does not exonerate the parents of responsibility for their failure to acknowledge, it appears to have led at least the mother down a primrose path that will now result in the loss of parental rights to this child. What is also disturbing is that Taylor has now been in the almost constant custody of these parents for all of his three and one-half years. As we have said previously, such sudden alterations can be so traumatic that they may create an adverse impact for the duration of that child's life. As we said in syllabus point three of James M. V. Maynard, 185 W. Va. 648, 408 S.E.2d 400 (1991):

> It is a traumatic experience for children to undergo sudden and dramatic changes in their permanent custodians. Lower courts in cases such as these should provide, whenever possible, for a gradual transition period, especially where young children are involved. Further, such gradual transition periods should be developed in a manner intended to foster the emotional adjustment of the children to this change and to maintain as much stability as possible in their lives.

At the most recent West Virginia State Judicial Conference, Dr. Rosalind Folman, a research assistant at the University of Michigan who holds a Ph.D. in Developmental Child Psychology and Social Work, identified this problem in her remarks to the judges of this state. She urged that judges overseeing children's cases attempt to avoid at all costs the sudden, traumatic removal of children from their familiar settings.

Thus, in the event that no suitable relative is found for the permanent placement of Taylor, then at least there should be a gradual transition of this little boy to his permanent adoptive home. He should not be unceremoniously routed out of the only home he has ever known, and he should not be placed in a temporary foster home pending the location of an adoptive home. He should be moved directly, but very gradually, to what will become his permanent adoptive home. If the Department or the guardian ad litem feel that the child is in imminent danger in the home of his biological parents, then the home of the maternal grandmother who has been very involved in his life, or some other relative who Taylor already knows and loves, should be chosen to care for him during the gradual transition.

Lastly, the circuit court in developing the post-termination visitation plan should bear in mind the necessity of minimizing the pain and trauma this little boy will endure in making this major transition in his life. Contact with the parents should be maximized, even if in a supervised setting, so as to facilitate that goal. I urge these principles be followed not for the protection of the parents' rights, but for the protection of Taylor's rights not to have further trauma visited upon his life.

Starcher, Justice, dissenting:

I am concerned that the majority opinion has, in effect, applied a bright-line rule: unless a parent who abuses their child admits to the abuse, and unless the other parent accuses the "abuser parent" of abuse, neither parent will ever be the child's parent again.

I understand the reasoning behind this sort of rule, but because it seemingly admits to no exceptions, I think that it may run contrary to the principle of assuring that the best interests of the child are held paramount.

Probably a large percentage of parents who commit abuse to a child will never admit to the abuse -- because it is a crime for which they can be imprisoned, and/or because the admission is psychologically so difficult. The same reasoning holds true for making accusations of abuse against one's fellow parent.

But it seems to me to be unreasonable to assume that parents who can't or won't "'fess up" or make an accusation regarding abuse can't ever become and behave as acceptable parents. Nothing in our statutes says that this is a judgment that the Legislature has made, and I don't think this is an accepted principle of social science. So how can we make this the premise of such a harsh rule, a rule that certainly will have the effect of tearing some children away from basically loving and caring parents, and placing these children into the highly problematic worlds of foster care and adoption?

In the instant case, there was a remarkable uniformity of opinion in the testimony that the mother in this case is a good, hard-working and caring parent. The evidence also showed that the father -- although he very likely seriously abused the child once or twice by a fit of shaking -- was otherwise a loving, decent parent who was improving and trying to do better. Moreover, it's been over three years since the shaking injury to this child, and there's been no evidence that everything is not going okay with the child in the mother's care.

I certainly think that there is strong reason for DHHR to pay extremely close attention to this situation. It would make sense to require the father to continue parenting education indefinitely. But I think it is complete overkill to terminate the mother's and the father's parental rights simply because the mother refuses to point an accusing finger to her husband and he will not acknowledge his acts of abuse.

Like the trial judge, I think that the weight of the evidence in this case at this time is that this situation can be salvaged, and the child protected completely -- without using the drastic step of terminating parental rights.

Because I don't think it is wise, necessary or legally required to preclude all parents who do not admit or accuse abuse from being parents -- and because I think the trial judge made the right call in this particular case -- I respectfully dissent.

JUSTICE MAYNARD delivered the Opinion of the Court.

SYLLABUS BY THE COURT

1. Pursuant to Rule 35(a)(1) of the West Virginia Rules of Procedure for Child Abuse and Neglect, an oral voluntary relinquishment of parental rights is valid if the parent who chooses to relinquish is present in court and the court determines that the parent understands the consequences of a termination of parental rights, is aware of less drastic alternatives than termination, and is informed of the right to a hearing and to representation by counsel.

2. An oral voluntary relinquishment of parental rights made on the record in open court is valid regardless of whether the parent who chooses to terminate his or her rights executes and submits a duly acknowledged writing pursuant to W.Va. Code § 49-6-7.

Maynard, Justice:

On November 17, 2000, during a status review hearing in the Circuit Court of Wayne County, the appellant, Bonita W., voluntarily relinquished her parental rights to her daughters, Sarah S.B. and Tessla N.M. The appellant subsequently filed a motion seeking to set aside the voluntary termination. The circuit court denied the motion. She alleges the court erred because the oral relinquishment was not verified in writing and was made under duress. We find no error.

I.

FACTS

Sarah S.B. is the daughter of Bonita W. and Dennis G. and is currently seven years old. Tessla N.M. is the daughter of Bonita W. and Ricky M. and is currently five years old.[1] The West Virginia Department of Health and Human Resources (DHHR) has provided assistance to the appellant since Sarah was approximately eight months old. On May 2, 2000, Sarah and Tessla were referred to DHHR because both girls alleged that their mother's husband, Tester Wayne W., sexually abused them. The girls also reported that their mother sexually and physically abused them.

[1]Bonita W. recently gave birth to a third child who is not involved in this appeal.

On May 16, 2000, Deborah Roach, a social worker for DHHR, filed a petition in the interest of the children. The petition stated that Sarah and Tessla reported that they had been sexually abused by Wayne W.; that both girls were infested with head lice; that the home was dirty with dog feces on the floor; that one child was observed eating food off of the porch floor; and that Sarah must repeat kindergarten even though she is of average intelligence because she missed over forty days of school. The petition stated that the appellant took the girls to Wayne Health Services to see a doctor regarding sexual abuse but failed to take them to the sexual abuse examinations which Wayne Health Services scheduled in Huntington. The appellant also failed to bring the girls to interviews that were scheduled with DHHR. When DHHR suggested that a Child Protective Services (CPS) case might be opened to protect the children, the appellant threatened to take the children to visit her father in Ohio and not return to West Virginia. This was a real concern for DHHR because the appellant moved to Virginia once before while a CPS case was open. The children also indicated that Wayne W. would move with them.[2]

DHHR petitioned for emergency removal of the children from the home. On May 22, 2000, the circuit court determined the children were neglected or abused and set the matter for preliminary hearing on May 26, 2000. The order does not specify the physical placement of the children at that time.[3] Counsel was appointed to represent the appellant and that representation has continued throughout these proceedings. At the close of the May 26, 2000 hearing, the court found "by clear and convincing proof that the children are neglected or abused by reason of the following facts: (1) That the children may have been touched inappropriately; and (2) that there are severe problems in the cleanliness and care of the children." DHHR retained temporary legal custody of the children who were to remain in their present placement; the appellant was granted supervised visitation; Dennis G.'s schedule of visitation continued; Ricky M. would have no contact with the children until he appeared before the court; and Wayne W. was prohibited from having any contact with the children.

Following a review hearing which was held on July 6, 2000, the court directed DHHR to develop a family case plan and ordered the appellant to fully comply with the plan. The appellant subsequently filed a motion for an improvement period. The dispositional hearing was held on August 11, 2000 at which time the court found that the appellant "has recently begun to be minimally compliant with [DHHR]." Consequently, she was granted a post-adjudicatory improvement period of six months. DHHR retained legal custody of the children and Patricia G., Dennis G.'s mother, was granted physical custody of both girls.

[3]Dr. Melody Cyrus examined Sarah on May 24, 2000. Her report states that Sarah was living with her paternal grandmother, Patricia G.

A status review hearing was held on November 17, 2000. At the beginning of the hearing, Steven Cook, the appellant's attorney, made a proffer to the court stating that the appellant was considering voluntarily relinquishing her parental rights. During the hearing, Mr. Cook questioned the appellant. He specifically asked her if she contacted him "several months ago . . . about considering a relinquishment of your rights." She answered, "Yes, I did." He then asked, "But as of today's date you have decided to bring this to the Judge's attention and you would like to voluntarily relinquish; is that correct?" She answered, "Yes." The appellant explained her reasoning to the court. She stated that the girls were doing well with Patricia G. and seemed happy. She believed the girls were confused and hurting from being "pull[ed] back and forth not knowing and wondering[,]" and she thought the time had come to stop the uncertainty. She stated that she wanted "them to be able to make a transition and go ahead and hopefully be happy[.]"

Mr. Cook questioned the appellant extensively regarding whether she was making this decision "of [her] own free will[]" and whether she understood that she did not have to voluntarily relinquish her rights. She unequivocally stated that she understood what she was doing and that she was making the decision of her own free will. As to post- termination visitation, the appellant stated that she understood the girls could see her if they so chose. She also understood that she would have no actual right to see the children and could not force visitation. Her attorney finally asked, "You have had a long time to think about this; correct?" The appellant answered, "Yes. I have had seven months and two days to think about this."

The court accepted the voluntary relinquishment by stating,

> I believe the mother has made a reasoned and voluntary decision based on the fact that she has recognized what she believes to be in the best interest of the children and has voluntarily relinquished her parental rights. I'm going to accept the voluntary relinquishment. Her parental rights will be terminated.

The improvement period and the appellant's parental rights were terminated in the court's order which was entered on December 22, 2000. Thereafter, on February 13, 2001, the appellant filed a motion seeking to set aside the oral relinquishment of her parental rights. In support of her motion, she argued that an agreement to terminate parental rights cannot be valid unless it is made by a duly acknowledged writing.[4] She stated further that she did not wish to relinquish her rights at that time; therefore, any termination would not be voluntary. On April 13, 2001, the court entered an order which terminated Ricky M.'s parental rights to Tessla N.M. due to abandonment; ordered DHHR to determine whether post-termination visitation would take place between the appellant and the children; and denied the appellant's motion to revoke her voluntary relinquishment of parental rights. It is from this order that the appellant appeals.

[4]W.Va. Code § 49-6-7 (1977) states, "An agreement of a natural parent in termination of parental rights shall be valid if made by a duly acknowledged writing, and entered into under circumstances free from duress and fraud."

This appeal presents a question of law involving interpretation of a statute. Accordingly, "[w]here the issue on an appeal from the circuit court is clearly a question of law or involving an interpretation of a statute, we apply a de novo standard of review." Syllabus Point 1, Chrystal R.M. v. Charlie A.L., 194 W.Va. 138, 459 S.E.2d 415 (1995). Moreover,

> When this Court reviews challenges to the findings and conclusions of the circuit court, a two-prong deferential standard of review is applied. We review the final order and the ultimate disposition under an abuse of discretion standard, and we review the circuit court's underlying factual findings under a clearly erroneous standard.

Syllabus Point 1, McCormick v. Allstate Ins. Co., 197 W.Va. 415, 475 S.E.2d 507 (1996).

DISCUSSION

On appeal, the appellant contends the circuit court erred by terminating her parental rights pursuant to an oral relinquishment when W.Va. Code § 49-6-7 requires a duly acknowledged writing. She also believes the voluntary relinquishment should be set aside because the decision was made under duress. DHHR argues that the statute does not contemplate that a parent may only relinquish parental rights in writing and this becomes clear when the statute is read together with the Rules of Procedure for Child Abuse and Neglect.

DHHR also contends there is no evidence to support the appellant's belated claim that she was compelled to relinquish her rights under duress. We agree.

The first issue which we must resolve is whether an oral voluntary relinquishment of parental rights is valid when the relinquishment is made in open court on the record but is not followed up with a duly acknowledged writing. In the case sub judice, the appellant admits she voluntarily terminated her rights to both girls on the record in open court. There is no question the voluntary relinquishment occurred after extensive questioning by the appellant's attorney. She, nonetheless, argues on appeal that because of duress and because she was later informed the State would not pursue sexual assault charges against Wayne W., she did not intend to voluntarily terminate her rights on November 17, 2000. She believes this is borne out by the fact that no duly acknowledged writing exists.

The appellant's argument is confusing. In the brief she submitted on appeal, the appellant admits that she voluntarily relinquished her rights but at the same time she argues "that she never intended to relinquish her parental rights." She obviously cannot have it both ways. It appears, from reading her brief and the record submitted on appeal, that the appellant fully intended to voluntarily relinquish her rights during the November 17, 2000 court hearing but later changed her mind. Three months passed between the voluntary termination and the date on which the appellant filed her motion seeking to set aside the voluntary relinquishment. She relates that at some point during this time she understood the State would not pursue sexual abuse charges against Wayne W. and indicates that she changed her mind at that time. However, that is not what she argues; instead, she tries to convince this Court that she did not intend to do what she did during the November 17, 2000 hearing. The transcript of the hearing suggests otherwise.

At the beginning of the hearing, the appellant's attorney[5] made a proffer to the court. He stated, "I will just proffer that she is considering a voluntary relinquishment and we would like to put some things on the record." Her attorney then questioned the appellant regarding whether she wanted to relinquish her rights and whether the relinquishment was voluntary. He also had the appellant explain her reasoning to the court. The court accepted the relinquishment on the record in open court and subsequently entered an order stating that "the Court is of the opinion that the least restrictive alternative which is in the best interest of the children in this case is to accept the voluntary relinquishment of parental rights by Bonita W. and to terminate such parental rights." Given this set of facts, we cannot say the circuit court abused its discretion by terminating the appellant's rights and by refusing to set the voluntary termination aside. The remaining question is whether the termination is valid minus a written agreement.

[5]We note that the attorney who questioned the appellant in the November 17, 2000 hearing is the same attorney who represents her on appeal.

When one reconciles W.Va. Code § 49-6-7 with the West Virginia Rules of Procedure for Child Abuse and Neglect,[6] it becomes obvious that a voluntary relinquishment made on the record in open court is valid regardless of whether the oral relinquishment is followed by a duly acknowledged writing. Rule 35(a)(1) contains the procedure whereby rights may be terminated when the parent(s) is/are present in court and has/have not signed a relinquishment of parental rights; Rule 35(a)(3) contains the procedure whereby rights may be terminated when the parent(s) is/are present in court and has/have voluntarily relinquished parental rights in writing. If rights could only be terminated by a signed agreement, then Rule

[6]Rules 35(a)(1) and (3) of the Rules of Procedure for Child Abuse and Neglect read as follows:

> (a) Uncontested termination of parental rights.--If a parent voluntarily relinquishes parental rights or fails to contest termination of parental rights, the court shall make the following inquiry at the disposition hearing:
> (1) If the parent(s) is/are present at the hearing but fail(s) to contest termination of parental rights, the court shall determine whether the parent(s) fully understand(s) the consequences of a termination of parental rights, is/are aware of possible less drastic alternatives than termination, and was/were informed of the right to a hearing and to representation by counsel.
> (3) If the parent(s) is/are present in court and voluntarily has/have signed a relinquishment of parental rights, the court shall determine whether the parent(s) fully understand(s) the consequences of a termination of parental rights, is/are aware of possible less drastic alternatives than termination, and was/were informed of the right to a hearing and to representation by counsel.

35(a)(1) would be unnecessary. Either way, the circuit court must determine whether the parent understands the consequences of terminating his or her rights, is aware of less drastic alternatives, and has been informed of the right to a hearing and to representation by counsel.

In the case at bar, the appellant was present in a court hearing and was represented by counsel; she fully understood the alternatives which the department might pursue; and she stated that she understood the consequences of voluntarily relinquishing her rights. The requirements of the rule were satisfied. A signed agreement was not required under these circumstances; we will discuss, infra, when signed agreements are required. We hold that, pursuant to Rule 35(a)(1) of the Rules of Procedure for Child Abuse and Neglect, an oral voluntary relinquishment of parental rights is valid if the parent who chooses to relinquish is present in court and the court determines that the parent understands the consequences of a termination of parental rights, is aware of less drastic alternatives than termination, and is informed of the right to a hearing and to representation by counsel.

Voluntary relinquishments do not always take place in a court room. Parents may be in an extrajudicial setting when they choose to terminate their rights. For instance, a parent may choose to terminate his or her rights when he or she is in a DHHR office or when he or she is involved in a private adoption proceeding. It is these situations to which W.Va.

Code § 49-6-7 applies, and these relinquishments are valid only "if made by a duly acknowledged writing[.]"

In contrast to what he now argues, the transcript of the February 9, 2001 interim judicial review hearing demonstrates that appellant's counsel agreed with the court that an oral relinquishment is valid when a parent who chooses to terminate his or her rights is present before the court. The following colloquy took place:

> THE COURT: The way I read that [W.Va. Code § 49-6-7] is if the parent doesn't appear here, they may enter a valid voluntary relinquishment signed and notarized and presented in court. It's valid. It can be a valid voluntary relinquishment without being present in court. She was present in court.
> MR. STAPLETON: That is correct, Your Honor. We do not intend to mislead the Court in any way. The Court inquired of her and she said several times that she did consent to it.

We agree with the circuit court that parents who relinquish their parental rights outside of a court setting must submit a signed and notarized agreement in order for the relinquishment to be valid. We, therefore, hold that an oral relinquishment of parental rights made on the record in open court is valid regardless of whether the parent who chooses to terminate his or her rights executes and submits a duly acknowledged writing pursuant to W.Va. Code § 49-6-7 (1977).[7] Of course, all agreements to terminate parental rights must be made free from duress and fraud.

That is the appellant's final complaint. She contends that she agreed to terminate her rights under duress and, as a result, the relinquishment cannot be accepted by the court as valid. In the brief she submitted on appeal she states that the duress amounted to a DHHR worker explaining to her that relinquishment would be in the best interests of the children and telling her that she would be able to visit the children through a post-termination visitation plan. The transcript of the hearing does not substantiate this complaint.

During the hearing, the appellant specifically stated that she wished to voluntarily relinquish; that she was relinquishing of her own free will; that she first approached her attorney to suggest voluntary relinquishment; and that she understood the decision regarding post-termination visitation would be left up to the children and DHHR. Three months later the appellant's attorney represented to the court for the first time that the appellant had changed her mind and did "not desire to have her parental rights terminated." He asked the court to set aside the voluntary termination. The court reviewed the circumstances under which the relinquishment took place and considered the best interests of the children. The motion to revoke was denied. Under these circumstances, we cannot say the court abused its discretion by "deny[ing] [the appellant] the right to withdraw her voluntary relinquishment."

The appellant chose to voluntarily relinquish her parental rights on the record in open court. The court correctly determined the relinquishment was valid minus a notarized written agreement. The appellant understood the consequences of termination; her attorney assured her that he would "vigorously defend" against termination and fight for less drastic alternatives; and she was represented by counsel during these entire proceedings. The court fully complied with the requirements of the statute and the rules.

For the foregoing reasons, the order of the circuit court which denied the appellant's motion to set aside her voluntary termination of parental rights to Sarah S.B. and Tessla N.M. is affirmed.

Affirmed.

In re Ester Sue THAXTON, Louis Frederick Thaxton and Eugene Scott Thaxton

No. 15756
July 5, 1983
Rehearing Denied Oct. 20, 1983

SYLLABUS BY THE COURT

"Where a court having jurisdiction of child neglect or abuse proceedings denies a motion by a parent or guardian for an improvement plan under W.Va.Code § 49-6-2(b), the court must state on the record the compelling circumstances warranting the denial of such motion." Syllabus Point 3, State v. Scritchfield, 167 W.Va. 683, 280 S.E.2d 315 (1981).

Douglass & Douglass and Ernest M. Douglass, Parkersburg, for appellant, Nancy Thaxton, mother.

James M. Bradley, Jr., Parkersburg, for Ester Sue Thaxton, et al.

Elizabeth A. Pyles, Asst. Pros. Atty., Parkersburg, for State.

PER CURIAM:

The appellant, Nancy Thaxton, appeals from a final order of the Circuit Court of Wood County which permanently terminated her parental rights to her three children. Thaxton is the mother of Ester Sue Thaxton, 14; Louis Thaxton, 12; and Eugene Scott Thaxton, 10. The children's father was not identified during the trial and is not a party in this case.

The case began February 9, 1981, when Christine Cooke, a social worker for the Department of Welfare, filed a verified petition alleging that Ester Sue, Louis and Eugene were neglected children. W.Va.Code § 49-6-3 (1980 Repl.Vol.).

In Cooke's petition, the Department of Welfare asked that it be given permanent custody of the children with the right to consent to their adoption.

The court conducted an adjudicatory hearing March 12, 1981, on the petition's allegations. The state presented testimony by various school officials, including the children's teachers, and Cooke regarding the children's absences and lateness at school. They also testified about the inadequate care given the children by their mother which resulted in them arriving at school sleepy, with rumpled and/or dirty clothing.

Thaxton and a neighborhood youth testified for the appellant. Thaxton admitted the children had been absent and/or late at school, but gave various reasons why that had occurred. The boy testified that he had not bruised Ester Sue's throat by kissing her as the State had charged.

The court ruled that the children were neglected, continued the custody in the Department of Welfare, and set the case for dispositional hearing. See footnote 1 The court concluded that Thaxton had failed to ensure that her children attended school and arrived on time properly clothed and rested. Additionally, the court found that Thaxton had failed to ensure that Louis wore his glasses to school.

At a hearing April 2, 1981, appellant's counsel submitted a motion for an improvement period. The motion outlined specific actions which the appellant would have to take concerning the well-being of her children. The trial court deferred ruling on the motion pending a psychological examination of the children.

Prior to the dispositional hearing, the children underwent psychological testing. Thaxton also met with a psychologist who evaluated her children, but did not undergo extensive evaluation herself.

The appellant entered into an informal agreement October 20, 1981, with the Department of Welfare which outlined efforts she needed to make in order to regain custody of her children. The plan required Thaxton to obtain suitable housing for her family and to attend parenting classes at a local counseling center. Additionally, Thaxton was to meet with Cooke twice a month in order to visit her children.

The lower court conducted a dispositional hearing December 2, 1981, and March 25, 1982. The evidence showed that Thaxton was mildly retarded and her children suffered from learning disabilities. Expert psychological testimony indicated that Thaxton could not adequately care and supervise her children. Two psychologists recommended that contact between mother and children be retained, but that day-to-day custody remain with the Department of Welfare.

Cooke testified that Thaxton had made some attempt to secure housing, but was still living with her parents at the time of the hearing. Additionally, she had failed to attend the parenting classes and had stopped the twice-monthly meetings with her children in early December, 1981. Cooke testified that she had not detected any improvement in Thaxton's ability to care for her children.

In response, the mother testified that she had missed her visits with the social worker, and presumably the parenting classes, because she had been caring for a sick aunt. She also testified that she had been sick in December, 1981, and January, 1982.

The lower court ordered that permanent custody be given to the Department of Welfare and terminated Thaxton's parental rights. The court found that "there is no reasonable likelihood that the conditions of neglect ... can be substantially corrected in the future ..." The court noted that Thaxton had "failed to respond and follow through with reasonable rehabilitative efforts designed to reduce and prevent the neglect of [her] children." In its ruling, the court noted the psychologists' recommendation that some contact remain between children and mother, but observed that it did not see how permanent custody with the right of adoption could be given to the Department of Welfare subject to continued contact between mother and children.

The appellant's primary argument is that the lower court erred by severing Thaxton's parental rights since a less drastic alternative remedy was available. The appellant, however, does not specify what this alternative is. Rather, Thaxton argues that she be permitted to retain contact with her children even if permanent custody is awarded to the Department of Welfare.

W.Va.Code § 49-6-5(a)(6) authorizes termination of parental rights when "there is no reasonable likelihood that the conditions of neglect or abuse can be substantially corrected ...." W.Va.Code § 49-6-5(b) specifies the circumstances which justify parental termination.

However, W.Va. Code § 49-6-2(b) permits a parent to move the court for an improvement period of three to twelve months. "The court shall allow such an improvement period unless it finds compelling circumstances to justify a denial thereof, but may require temporary custody in the state department or another agency during the improvement period." Id.

"Where a court having jurisdiction of child neglect or abuse proceedings denies a motion by a parent or guardian for an improvement plan under W.Va. Code § 49-6-2(b), the court must state on the record the compelling circumstances warranting the denial of such motion." Syllabus Point 3, State v. Scritchfield, 167 W.Va., 683, 280 S.E.2d 315 (1981).

Upon the record before us, we do not find that the trial court ever ruled on the appellant's motion for an improvement period. Therefore, since the trial court did not rule, it could not have stated its reasons for denying such a motion. The appellant was entitled to the granting of her motion absent a finding of compelling circumstances. Since the trial court did not set forth any such reasons on the record, we conclude that the appellant is entitled to an improvement period.

The record indicates that the appellant and the Department of Welfare entered into an informal plan to improve the appellant's child-rearing ability. The record is silent, however, as to whether this agreement was an improvement plan submitted pursuant to W.Va.Code § 49-6-2(b) or that the trial court approved the agreement as a formal improvement plan.

Therefore, we reverse the judgment of the lower court and direct that a formal improvement plan be drawn up by the appellant and the Department of Welfare subject to the lower court's approval. Custody of the children is to remain with the parties designated by the Department of Welfare during the improvement plan.

Reversed and remanded.

Footnote: 1 The appellant's petition for appeal of the neglect ruling was denied by this Court. The sole issue in this appeal is whether the trial court imposed the appropriate remedy after the finding of neglect.

NEELY and McHUGH, JJ., dissent for the reason that they believe that the trial court properly terminated the parental rights and ordered that permanent custody of the children be given to the Department of Welfare.

Supreme Court Of Appeals Of West Virginia

IN THE INTEREST OF: TIFFANY MARIE S., TAYLOR BROOK S., CHILDREN UNDER THE AGE OF EIGHTEEN YEARS

NANCY S.E., Appellant

DEPARTMENT OF HEALTH AND HUMAN RESOURCES, Appellee

No. 23198
Submitted: February 6, 1996
Filed: March 20, 1996

SYLLABUS BY THE COURT

2. "Circuit courts should appoint counsel for parents and custodians required to be named as respondents in abuse and neglect proceedings incident to the filing of each abuse and neglect petition. Upon the appearance of such persons before the court, evidence should be promptly taken, by affidavit and otherwise, to ascertain whether the parties for whom counsel has been appointed are or are not able to pay for counsel. In those cases in which the evidence rebuts the presumption of inability to pay as to one or more of the parents or custodians, the appointment of counsel for any such party should be promptly terminated upon the substitution of other counsel or the knowing, intelligent waiver of the right to counsel. Counsel appointed in these circumstances are entitled to compensation as permitted by law." Syl. pt. 8, In the Matter of Lindsey C., ___ W. Va. ___, ___ S.E.2d ___ (No. 23065 12/14/95). (Emphasis in original).

Syl. pt. 3, State ex rel. W. Va. Department of Human Services v. Cheryl M., 177 W. Va. 688, 356 S.E.2d 181 (1987).

4. "In formulating the improvement period and family case plans, courts and social service workers should cooperate to provide a workable approach for the resolution of family problems which have prevented the child or children from receiving appropriate care from their parents. The formulation of the improvement period and family case plans should therefore be a consolidated, multi-disciplinary effort among the court system, the parents, attorneys, social service agencies, and any other helping personnel involved in assisting the family." Syl. pt. 4, In the Interest of Carlita B., 185 W. Va. 613, 408 S.E.2d 365 (1991).

5. "W. Va. Code, 49-6-2(c) [1980], requires the State Department of Welfare [now the Department of Health and Human Resources], in a child abuse or neglect case, to prove 'conditions existing at the time of the filing of the petition . . . by clear and convincing proof.' The statute, however, does not specify any particular manner or mode of testimony or evidence by which the State Department of Welfare is obligated to meet this burden." Syl. pt. 1, In the Interest of S.C., 168 W. Va. 366, 284 S.E.2d 867 (1981).

Cleckley, Justice:
Nancy S.E. See footnote 1 appeals a final order entered May 8, 1995, by the Circuit Court of Raleigh County, which terminated her parental rights to her two daughters, Tiffany Marie S. and Taylor Brook S. She asserts the circuit court erred by (1) failing to timely appoint counsel to represent her; (2) ordering an improvement period in excess of twelve months; (3) admitting irrelevant and prejudicial evidence of unrelated criminal charges; (4) conducting the termination hearing in her absence, and (5) finding she abused or neglected her two children. Nancy S.E. also contends the West Virginia Department of Health and Human Resources (Department) did not timely formulate a family case plan or show she failed to comply with the case plan. After reviewing the record, we find no reversible error and affirm the decision of the circuit court.

I.

FACTUAL AND PROCEDURAL HISTORY

On February 24, 1993, Alice Oglesby, a social worker with the Department, filed a petition pursuant to W. Va. Code, 49-6-1 (1992), See footnote 2 alleging that six-year-old Michael Emerson J., three-year-old Tiffany Marie S. and one-month-old Taylor Brook S. were abused and/or neglected children according to W. Va. Code, 49-1-3 (1992). See footnote 3 More specifically, the petition alleged that Brian S. See footnote 4 sexually molested Michael and Tiffany, that he had been arrested and charged with sexual assault, See footnote 5 and that Nancy S.E. had initially denied his guilt. The Department also expressed concern that Nancy S.E. would not be able to protect her children should Brian S. be released on bond, and the Department sought legal and physical custody of the children, but placed Taylor, Tiffany, and Michael with Nancy S.E.

The circuit court entered an order on February 24, 1993, filing the Department's petition, setting the matter for further hearing, advising the parties of their right to counsel, and granting the Department temporary custody. On April 19, 1993, the circuit court held a hearing, at which Nancy S.E. appeared unrepresented by counsel. See footnote 6 The circuit court continued the temporary legal and physical custody of the three children with the Department for an additional ninety days. See footnote 7

Nancy S.E. then determined she was unable to deal with all three children and sent Michael to live with her mother and Tiffany to stay with a family friend. On July 13, 1993, the circuit court held a preliminary hearing at which Nancy S.E. again appeared unrepresented by counsel. The circuit court further continued the temporary legal and physical custody of Taylor, Tiffany, and Michael See footnote 8 with the Department. The circuit court also granted Nancy S.E. a twelve-month improvement period and ordered the Department and Nancy S.E. to jointly formulate a family case plan within thirty days. See footnote 9 Following this hearing, the Department placed Tiffany in foster care in August, 1993.

Throughout the fall of 1993, Taylor continued to reside with Nancy S.E. The Department provided supervised visitation between Nancy S.E. and Tiffany because Nancy S.E. admitted she was seeing Brian S. Nancy S.E. worked at various jobs during this period and left Taylor with a babysitter for days and weeks at a time. The Department responded to several complaints that Taylor's babysitter was providing an unsuitable environment but found no evidence of inadequate conditions. In March, 1994, Nancy S.E. informed the Department she wanted to give Taylor to a male friend and his girlfriend. The Department on March 9, 1994, placed Taylor in foster care incident to her change of guardianship. Nancy S.E. subsequently stated she would like to have Taylor returned to her.

The circuit court held a hearing on May 19, 1994, at which Nancy S.E. appeared in person and by counsel. See footnote 10 As a result of this hearing, the circuit court ordered the Department to formulate a family case plan, directed Taylor's return to Nancy S.E. by July 5, 1994, and extended the improvement period until July 18, 1994.

Thereafter, the Department returned Taylor to Nancy S.E. on July 4, 1994. During the July 18, 1994, hearing, the parties reached an agreement which the circuit court entered on September 14, 1994. The agreed order extended the improvement period for an additional three months, returned Taylor's full custody to Nancy S.E., dismissed the Department's petition as to Taylor, and continued the Department's custody of Tiffany. The Department then returned Tiffany to Nancy S.E. on August 23, 1994. At an October 17, 1994, hearing, the circuit court accepted an agreed order whereby the Department agreed to return Tiffany's full custody to Nancy S.E. and to monitor the family for an additional three months.

The record indicates that during the fall of 1994, Nancy S.E. again worked at various jobs for up to eighty hours a week and frequently left Taylor and Tiffany with daycare providers and babysitters for periods of three to four weeks. In late November, 1994, Nancy S.E. telephoned Kim Peck and admitted using crack cocaine. Nancy S.E. also stated she was performing undercover work for the police to prevent being arrested on bad check charges. On November 29, 1994, the Department placed Taylor and Tiffany in respite foster care. Nancy S.E. alternately tried to regain custody of the girls and agreed to their placement in respite foster care. She also missed appointments with home services and scheduled visitations with her daughters.

The circuit court held a hearing on January 6, 1995, during which Kim Peck testified as to Nancy S.E.'s self-reported drug use and undercover work. Additionally, Nancy S.E. indicated she would voluntarily relinquish her parental rights to Taylor and Tiffany if Brian S. would do the same. Following this hearing, Nancy S.E. moved to Florida and decided she did not want to relinquish her parental rights to her two daughters. The circuit court on January 10, 1995, entered an order ratifying the Department's emergency taking of Taylor and Tiffany and granting the Department temporary legal custody of the girls once more.

Nancy S.E. continued to reside in Florida and maintained regular telephone contact with Taylor and Tiffany. However, she failed to attend drug rehabilitation meetings or to keep in regular contact with the Department. See footnote 11 On March 14, 1995, the Department filed a second petition pursuant to W. Va. Code, 49-6-1, See footnote 12 alleging that two-year-old Taylor and five-year-old Tiffany were abused and/or neglected children. See footnote 13 More specifically, the petition recounted the children's case history, beginning with the February 24, 1993, petition, and detailed Nancy S.E.'s unstable lifestyle and indecisiveness regarding custody of Taylor and Tiffany. In sum, the Department emphasized the girls' need for emotional stability and sought termination of Nancy S.E.'s parental rights. See footnote 14

On May 1, 1995, the circuit court held a final hearing in this matter. At the hearing, Nancy S.E.'s attorney requested a continuance, reporting that Nancy S.E. was "stuck in Georgia." See footnote 15 The circuit court denied this motion. Later in the proceedings, the circuit court admitted evidence of Nancy S.E.'s numerous outstanding arrest warrants in West Virginia for bad checks, commenting that her absence was most likely related to these charges. In addition, the Department presented the testimony of Kim Peck. Ms. Peck testified that Nancy S.E. was difficult to locate; failed to attend counseling sessions, rehabilitative treatments, and parenting classes; and was fired from numerous jobs. Ms. Peck further indicated that, given the case history, the Department felt Nancy S.E. would not be able to change her behavior or become an effective parent. The Department also called as a witness Saundra Kate Leeber, Tiffany's therapist. Ms. Leeber stated that Tiffany's demeanor had greatly improved after placement with stable foster families but cautioned that Tiffany's best interests require a stable, permanent placement. Finally, the guardian ad litem recommended termination of Nancy S.E.'s parental rights.

Based on the foregoing evidence, the circuit court entered a final order on May 8, 1995, finding Taylor and Tiffany to be abused and/or neglected children. The circuit court noted further that Nancy S.E. was an unstable person who had not complied with the Department's family case plan, that there was no reasonable likelihood that the conditions of abuse or neglect could be substantially corrected in the near future, and that the girls require stability and continuity of care. In conclusion, the circuit court terminated Nancy S.E.'s parental rights to Taylor and Tiffany and placed their permanent guardianship with the Department.

II.
DISCUSSION

After a brief discussion of the appropriate standard of review, we split our analysis into six segments. First, we consider the applicability of the harmless error doctrine to the failure to promptly appoint counsel in child abuse and neglect cases. Next, we examine the voluntary extension of an improvement period in excess of twelve months. Thirdly, we review the circuit court's rulings regarding the admission of "prejudicial evidence" and the denial of the request for a continuance or postponement of the final adjudicatory hearing. Finally, we mull the circuit court's findings on abuse and neglect and the lack of compliance with the family case plan under the deferential standard of review that pertains in this context.

At the outset, it should be noted that this case has lingered in the circuit court for approximately three years. Although what we say below adequately explains the reason this judgment should be affirmed, we feel obliged to comment on a larger issue. We are hard pressed to fathom why abuse and neglect cases are not given the same priority at the circuit court level as asbestos cases, personal injury cases, criminal cases, and cases involving boundary disputes when W. Va. Code, 49-6-2(d) (1992), rigidly commands that child abuse and neglect > "proceeding[s] . . . shall, to the extent practicable, be given priority over any other civil action before the court, except proceedings under article two-a [Section 48-2A-1 et seq.], chapter forty-eight of this code and actions in which trial is in progress. Any petition filed under the provisions of this article shall be docketed immediately upon filing. Any hearing to be held at the end of an improvement period and any other hearing to be held during any proceedings under the provisions of this article shall be held as nearly as practicable on successive days and, with respect to said hearing to be held at the end of an improvement period, shall be held as close in time as possible after the end of said improvement period."

Rule 8 of the Rules on Time Standards for Circuit Courts further instructs circuit courts to expeditiously process and timely dispose of abuse and neglect proceedings. See footnote 16

Furthermore, we have repeatedly urged circuit courts not only to give these matters serious and detailed consideration but also to advance them to the top of the trial calendar. In Syllabus Point 1 of In the Interest of Carlita B., 185 W. Va. 613, 408 S.E.2d 365 (1991), we expressed our concern over the all-too-frequent delays accompanying abuse and neglect cases:

> "Child abuse and neglect cases must be recognized as being among the highest priority for the courts' attention. Unjustified procedural delays wreak havoc on a child's development, stability and security. Consequently, in order to assure that all entities are actively pursuing the goals of the child abuse and neglect statutes, the Administrative Director of this Court is hereby directed to work with the clerks of the circuit court to develop systems to monitor the status and progress of child neglect and abuse cases in the courts."

We additionally recognized

> "[t]he clear import of the statute [W. Va. Code, 49-6-2(d)] is that matters involving the abuse and neglect of children shall take > precedence over almost every other matter with which a court deals on a daily basis, and it clearly reflects the goal that such proceedings must be resolved as expeditiously as possible."

Va. 623, 634-35, 461 S.E.2d 129, 140-41 (1995) (lamenting failure of circuit courts to accord abuse and neglect cases priority pursuant to Carlita B.); State ex rel. S.C. v. Chafin, 191 W. Va. 184, 192, 444 S.E.2d 62, 70 (1994) (refusing to tolerate lengthy delays in child abuse and neglect cases); Syl. pt. 3, Boarman v. Boarman, 190 W. > It is vital to the rule of law that legislative and appellate commands be honored. A judge is free, of course, to manage his or her own docket but, when such managerial decisions transgress appellate commands, it is incumbent upon the trial judge to avoid the further (and quite different) impression that he or she has crossed the line into disregard. The circumstances of the case at bar underscore this danger. A circuit court is not at liberty to disregard lawful directives of the Legislature and this Court simply because those directives conflict with the judge's individual notions of efficiency or docket control. In the last analysis, it is crucial to public confidence in the courts that judges be seen as enforcing the law and as obeying it themselves. Exactly so. This is the short of it--and there is no long of it. See footnote 17

City, N.C., 470 U.S. 564, 574, 105 S. Ct. 1504, 1511, 84 L.Ed.2d 518, 528 (1985). Finally, "[w]hen findings are based on determinations regarding the credibility of witnesses, Rule 52(a) demands even greater deference to the trial court's findings[.]" 470 U.S. at 575, 105 S. Ct. at 1512, 84 L.Ed.2d at 529. Deference is appropriate because the trial judge was on the spot and is better able than an appellate court to decide whether the error affected substantial rights of the parties. Martin v. Randolph County Bd. of Educ., ___ W. Va. ___, ___, 465 S.E.2d 399, 406 (1995). Applying this blend of deferential-plenary standards of review to the facts of this case, we are of the opinion that the circuit court's findings were not clearly erroneous nor wrong as a matter of law.

B.

Appointment of Counsel

Nancy S.E. first argues the circuit court erred by failing to timely appoint counsel to represent her. She asserts she was unrepresented by counsel from February 23, 1993, until May, 1994. More specifically, Nancy S.E. complains she was not represented during the hearings held on February 23, 1993; April 19, 1993; and July 13, 1993.

A circuit court has broad statutory and case authority to appoint counsel in child abuse and neglect cases. As suggested above, these are important proceedings and the appointment and participation of counsel will often be critical to the outcome. Abuse and neglect proceedings are designed to be adversarial, see In re Christina L., 194 W. Va. 446, 453, 460 S.E.2d 692, 699 (1995), and the circuit court's role is to ensure that litigants are adequately represented by counsel from the beginning to the end of these proceedings. In emphasizing the role of the circuit court and counsel, we do not write on a pristine page. This Court recently constructed a bright-line rule to be followed when there is any doubt as to how to proceed. In Syllabus Point 8 of In the Matter of Lindsey C., ___ W. Va. ___, ___ S.E.2d ___ (No. 23065 12/14/95), we stated:

> "Circuit courts should appoint counsel for parents and custodians required to be named as respondents in abuse and neglect proceedings incident to the filing of each abuse and neglect petition. Upon the appearance of such persons before the court, evidence should be promptly taken, by affidavit and otherwise, to ascertain whether the parties for whom counsel has been appointed are or are not able to pay for counsel. In those cases in which the evidence rebuts the presumption of inability to pay as to one or more of the parents or custodians, the appointment of counsel for any such party should be promptly terminated upon the substitution of other counsel or the knowing, intelligent waiver of the right to counsel. Counsel > appointed in these circumstances are entitled to compensation as permitted by law." (Emphasis in original).

We caution circuit courts to follow this procedure in order to prevent potential prejudice to unrepresented indigent parents in abuse and neglect proceedings. W. Va. Code, 49-6-2(a) (1992), provides, in part:

> "In any proceeding under the provisions of this article, [the] parents . . . shall have the right to be represented by counsel at every stage of the proceedings and shall be informed by the court of their right to be so represented and that if they cannot pay for the services of counsel, that counsel will be appointed. If the other parties have not retained counsel and the other parties cannot pay for the services of counsel, the court shall, by order entered of record, at least ten days prior to the date set for hearing, appoint an attorney or attorneys to represent the other party or parties and so inform the parties."

It appears that in the proceedings involving the original petition filed February 24, 1993, the circuit court did inform Nancy S.E. of her right to be represented by counsel. However, the record does not indicate whether the circuit court ever informed Nancy S.E. of her right to have counsel appointed to represent her in the event she could not afford to hire an attorney. Regardless of the information provided by the circuit court, Nancy S.E. does not assert on appeal that she was indigent during the period in question.

Assuming, arguendo, that Nancy S.E. was entitled to appointed counsel during the period in question, we find she was not prejudiced by the circuit court's failure to earlier appoint counsel. During the February 23, 1993, hearing, the circuit court granted temporary legal and physical custody of Taylor and Tiffany to the Department, which voluntarily placed the children with Nancy S.E. Thus, Nancy S.E. retained the right to keep Taylor and Tiffany in her home and was not prejudiced by the circuit court's ruling or the Department's actions. Similarly, Nancy S.E. was not prejudiced by the April 19, 1993, proceedings; the circuit court merely ordered a ninety-day continuance of the temporary custody, and the Department did not disturb the children's placement with Nancy S.E. Finally, during the July 13, 1993, hearing, the circuit court again continued temporary custody with the Department, granted Nancy S.E. a twelve-month improvement period, and ordered the Department and Nancy S.E. to jointly develop a family case plan. Thus, Nancy S.E. was permitted an opportunity to regain her children's full custody and directed to participate in the development of the family case plan.

It should be noted that Taylor and Tiffany remained with Nancy S.E. throughout this entire period until Nancy S.E. decided she could no longer care for the girls and voluntarily relinquished their care to the Department. See footnote 18 Moreover, both girls were returned to Nancy S.E.'s care, although she ultimately agreed to their later placement in respite foster care. See footnote 19 We do not find that Nancy S.E. was prejudiced by the failure of the circuit court to appoint counsel. It appears that Nancy S.E. is arguing that, when counsel is not appointed timely, all proceedings conducted without counsel should be presumed void. Though it certainly can be argued that strong reasons of public policy justify such a burden-shifting scheme, our cases have not committed to such a theory except in criminal cases involving critical stages. See State ex rel. Daniel v. Legursky, ___ W. Va. ___, ___, 465 S.E.2d 416, 423 (1995). While this point is intellectually interesting, we defer a definitive decision on it to a different day. After all, there is no clear indication that Nancy S.E. requested the appointment of counsel because of indigency.

C.

Duration of Improvement Period

Nancy S.E. asserts the circuit court erroneously ordered an improvement period in excess of twelve months. Pursuant to W. Va. Code, 49-6-2(b) (1992),

> "any parent or custodian may, prior to final hearing, move to be allowed an improvement period of three to twelve months in order to remedy the circumstances or alleged circumstances upon which the proceeding is based. The court shall allow one such improvement period unless it finds compelling circumstances to justify a denial thereof[.]."

In this case, the circuit court granted Nancy S.E. a twelve-month improvement period. See footnote 20 At the conclusion of this improvement period in July of 1994, the parties submitted an agreed order extending the improvement period for an additional three months. While the statute permits a maximum improvement period of only twelve months, Nancy S.E. and the Department voluntarily extended the duration of the improvement period beyond the maximum limit. See footnote 21

We find no reversible error in this situation. At no time during the proceedings below did Nancy S.E. voice any objection to the extension of time. Rather, she vigorously (and successfully) sought an extension of time. In other words, Nancy S.E. chose to roll the dice, apparently confident that more time would improve her position before the court at her final hearing. Having gambled and lost, she is in a perilously poor position to pursue this point. In any event, we regularly turn a deaf ear to error that was invited by the complaining party. See Smith v. Bechtold, 190 W. Va. 315, 438 S.E.2d 347 (1993) ("invited error" when appellant moved for the very delay that was the subject of the appeal). As a result, Nancy S.E. cannot now complain on appeal that she was harmed by a fifteen-month improvement period when she agreed to this arrangement. Moreover, she has not shown that she was prejudiced by this improvement period.

D.

Admission of Criminal Charges

Nancy S.E. next contends the circuit court erred by admitting irrelevant and prejudicial evidence of unrelated criminal charges. She states that during the January 6, 1995, hearing, the State introduced evidence that she was performing undercover work for the police to prevent arrest on bad check charges. In the same manner, the State presented testimony at the May 1, 1995, hearing that Nancy S.E. had numerous outstanding arrest warrants for bad check charges. Nancy S.E. maintains this evidence was highly prejudicial and unrelated to the abuse and neglect proceedings.

The first question is easily answered. The decision whether to admit evidence rests within the sound discretion of the circuit court. See State v. Guthrie, 194 W. Va. 657, 680-81, 461 S.E.2d 163, 186-87 (1995). This discretion remains fully intact when the business of the day is abuse and neglect proceedings. Appellate review is therefore deferential; we will interfere with a circuit court's ruling on evidentiary matters only if an appellant demonstrates an abuse of the circuit court's substantial discretion. See State v. McGinnis, 193 W. Va. 147, 159, 455 S.E.2d 516, 528 (1994). We discern no abuse in this situation.

Rather, we find Nancy S.E.'s assignment of error regarding the January 6, 1995, hearing to be without merit as she did not properly preserve her objection for appeal. The West Virginia Rules of Evidence declare that parties must object to the wrongful offer of evidence at a particular time and with reasonable specificity. The failure to object at the time and in the manner designated by Rule 103(a) of the West Virginia Rules of Evidence is treated as a procedural default, with the result that the evidence, even if erroneous, becomes the facts of the case. West Virginia practice imposes the same duty of diligence in regard to nonjury cases. Silence in the circuit court typically constitutes a waiver of objection. See W.Va.R.Evid. 103(a)(1). See footnote 22

The transcript of the January 6, 1995, hearing reveals that Nancy S.E.'s counsel never objected to the introduction of evidence of her undercover police work or moved to strike this testimony from the record. Evidence of Nancy S.E.'s criminal record and undercover drug work, while not dispositive, is a relevant factor in the circuit court's determination of her ability to provide a safe home environment for her children. To be sure, an appellate court may review an unpreserved error if the error is "plain." See W.Va.R.Evid. 103(d). However, this doctrine is reserved for the most egregious circumstances. State v. Miller, 194 W. Va. 3, 459 S.E.2d 114

(1995). Normally, the alleged error must have seriously affected the fairness or integrity of the trial. We find no error in this case.

Finally, Nancy S.E. was not prejudiced by the admission of her bad check charges during the May 1, 1995, hearing. Upon admitting this testimony, the circuit court expressly stated these charges were not indicative of abuse and neglect but were more probative as to why Nancy S.E. was not present at the final hearing. Therefore, the circuit court did not abuse its discretion in admitting evidence of Nancy S.E.'s unrelated criminal charges.

E.
At Final Termination Hearing

Nancy S.E. complains the circuit court improperly conducted the final termination hearing in her absence. Without doubt this is her most serious assignment of error. On the morning of May 1, 1995, the date of the final hearing, Nancy S.E. left a message on her attorney's answering machine stating she was "stuck in Georgia" and would not be at the termination hearing. During the final hearing, counsel for Nancy S.E. informed the circuit court of Nancy S.E.'s absence and requested a continuance of the proceedings. The circuit court denied this motion and proceeded to take evidence on the issue of abuse and neglect. Nancy S.E. asserts the circuit court should have continued the hearing to a time when she could be present so she could testify and explain her alleged failure to complete the Department's family case plan and her current, more stable lifestyle.

Whether a party should be granted a continuance for fairness reasons is a matter left to the discretion of the circuit court, and a reviewing court plays a limited and restricted role in overseeing the circuit court's exercise of that discretion. State v. Judy, 179 W. Va. 734, 372 S.E.2d 796 (1988) (when a matter is committed to the discretion of the trial court, its decision will not be disturbed unless there is a clear showing of abuse of such discretion); State ex rel. Holstein v. Casey, 164 W. Va. 460, 265 S.E.2d 530 (1980) (accord). Of course, discretion is not to be confused with imperiousness. State v. Bush, 163 W. Va. 168, 183, 255 S.E.2d 539, 547 (1979). When a circuit court rejects a civil litigant's request for a continuance because the party is unable to attend, the court must articulate reasons for taking that action, and those reasons must be plausible. Therefore, we structure our review in accordance with four salient factors that appellate courts consider when reviewing denials of requests for a continuance. First, we consider the extent of Nancy S.E.'s diligence in her efforts to be present and to ready her defense prior to the date set for the hearing. Second, we consider how likely it is that the need for a continuance could have been met if the continuance had been granted. Third, we consider the extent to which granting the continuance would have inconvenienced or been contrary to the interests of the circuit court, the witnesses, and the other litigants, including the public interest in the prompt disposition of these types of proceedings. Finally, we consider the extent to which Nancy S.E. might have suffered harm as a result of the circuit court's denial. See footnote 23

Again, we acknowledge that the determination as to whether a denial of a continuance constitutes an abuse of discretion must be made on an ad hoc basis. When confronted with a motion for a continuance, the trial court may have a variety of concerns. Obviously, the reasons that the movant contemporaneously adduces in support of the request are important. Then, too, the court is likely to take into account prior postponements. Thus, the test for deciding whether the circuit court abused its discretion is not mechanical; it depends on the reasons presented to the circuit court at the time the request was made. In other words, this issue must be decided in light of the circumstances presented, focusing upon the reasons for the continuance offered to the circuit court when the request was denied. As we discuss above, there are important interests implicated other than those of the parents. In addition to the sacred rights of the affected children, there is a societal interest in providing for speedy disposition of abuse and neglect cases which exists separate from, and at times in opposition to, the parents' interest. The inability of courts to bring these matters to a prompt disposition contributes immeasurably to large backlogs of abuse and neglect cases and often prevents the courts from doing what is in the best interests of the children. The older a child becomes while waiting in the judicial system, the more difficult quality permanent placement becomes. In this context, abuse can be found in the denial of a continuance only when it can be seen as "an unreasoning and arbitrary `insistence upon expeditiousness in the face of a justifiable request for delay[.]'" Morris v. Slappy, 461 U.S. 1, 11-12, 103 S. Ct. 1610, 1616, 75 L.Ed.2d 610, 620 (1983), quoting Ungar v. Sarafite, 376 U.S. 575, 589, 84 S. Ct. 841, 849, 11 L.Ed.2d 921, 931 (1964). It is in the province of the circuit court to manage its docket, and within that province, to decide what constitutes a reasonable time to be prepared to defend these type allegations. See footnote 24

In determining whether the circuit court acted in an arbitrary or unreasonable manner, we consider the above relevant factors together, evaluating the extent of Nancy S.E.'s showing on each one. In order to obtain a reversal, Nancy S.E. must show at a minimum that she suffered prejudice as a result of the denial of her request. However, the mere fact that an appellant suggests a continuance could benefit him or her does not necessarily require the circuit court to grant the continuance. To be perfectly clear, even the presence of prejudice on the part of a party in an abuse and neglect proceeding does not require the circuit court to grant the requested relief if the other factors identified above are entitled to more weight. The weight we attribute to any single factor may vary with the extent of the showing on other factors. We regard none of the factors identified above as either a necessary or sufficient condition to the finding of an abuse of discretion.

Rather, they are related factors and must be considered together with such other circumstances as may be relevant. Each case is sui generis, and the compendium of relevant factors varies from situation to situation. In sum, these factors have no talismanic qualities; a court must still engage in a difficult and sensitive balancing process. But, because these proceedings involve fundamental rights of the parents and children, this process, which is specifically confirmed in our statute, must be carried out with full recognition of society's interests in speedy dispositions.

Here, the balance tilts heavily against Nancy S.E. and the circuit court offered an adequate explanation of why it believed the factors advanced by Nancy S.E. were not sufficiently compelling to justify another postponement of the ultimate judgment. Her reproof is mostly sound and fury, signifying little. At the time the request for a continuance was made, the circuit court had no assurance that Nancy S.E. would ever appear. As the circuit court suggested, there were outstanding criminal charges against Nancy S.E. in West Virginia. Although she states she wanted to testify in order to explain why she did not complete the family case plan, Nancy S.E. does not show that she exercised due diligence in attempting to attend the final hearing. Moreover, the rights of the public and, more importantly, the children are implicated when finality is not promptly achieved in these proceedings. This case had been pending in the circuit court for three years, and the rights and interests of the children were dangling in the balance. Although the circuit court could have afforded Nancy S.E. the continuance, it chose not to do so. In the absence of either a mistake of law or a palpable abuse of discretion, we cannot substitute our judgment for the circuit court's judgment. We need go no further.

In the final analysis, it is the circuit court that is in the best position to weigh competing interests in deciding whether to grant a continuance or postponement. An appellate court looks primarily to the persuasiveness of the trial court's reasons for refusing the continuance and gives due regard not only to the factors that inform our opinion but also to its superior point of vantage. We may not reweigh the grounds afresh and, absent an abuse of discretion, the decision of the circuit court to reject a request for a continuance will not be overturned by an appellate court. In this instance, the record confirms that the lower court was rather generous, rather than grudging, in the time allotted to bring this case to a final disposition. Therefore, we find the circuit court did not abuse its discretion in refusing Nancy S.E.'s request for a continuance.

F.

Finding of Abuse or Neglect

The next question is whether the circuit court's finding of abuse and neglect is supportable. Nancy S.E. argues the evidence fails to meet its heightened burden of proof. The Department is required to prove the "conditions existing at the time of the filing of the petition . . . by clear and convincing proof." W. Va. Code, 49-6-2(c) (1992). Determining whether a parent or guardian has neglected or abused his or her children, like most adversarial-oriented explorations, is a predominantly factbound enterprise. It follows that, absent a mistake of law, an appellate tribunal should disturb a circuit court's determination only if it is clearly erroneous. This means, of course, that if there are two or more plausible interpretations of the evidence, the circuit court's choice among them must hold sway.

No clear error looms, and we find the circuit court was not clearly wrong in holding the Department satisfied its burden of proof. The evidence throughout this case concerned Nancy S.E.'s unstable lifestyle and provided examples of her indecisiveness about regaining full custody of her children, her repeated firings from good jobs, her pattern of leaving Taylor and Tiffany with babysitters for extended periods of time, her renewed usage of crack cocaine, and her failure to attend parenting classes and drug rehabilitation treatment sessions. During the final hearing, the Department called Kim Peck, who elaborated on the petition's allegations, and therapist Saundra Kate Leeber, who testified as to the emotional damage Tiffany had suffered from her unstable lifestyle with Nancy S.E. Finally, throughout the entire three-year case history, the Department filed regular court summaries to keep the circuit court apprised of recent developments. See footnote 25 Upon a review of the entire record, we find the circuit court had before it sufficient evidence with which to terminate Nancy S.E.'s parental rights. See footnote 26

We take no pleasure in upholding a finding of abuse or neglect of children. But the court below did not reach this conclusion lightly, and the record, carefully examined, does not give rise to a firm conviction that the circuit court's judgment is wide of the mark. Accordingly, the finding of abuse and neglect must stand.

G.
Family Case Plan

First, Nancy S.E. contends the Department failed to timely formulate a family case plan. In Syllabus Point 3 of State ex rel. West Virginia Department of Human Services v. Cheryl M., 177 W. Va. 688, 356 S.E.2d 181 (1987), we directed:

> "Under W. Va. Code, 49-6-2(b) (1984), when an improvement period is authorized, then the court by order shall require the Department of Human Services to prepare a family case plan pursuant to W. Va. Code, 49-6D-3 (1984)."

See also In re Elizabeth Jo "Beth" H., 192 W. Va. 656, 453 S.E.2d 639 (1994). W. Va. Code, 49-6D-3(b) (1984), further requires "the family case plan . . . shall be furnished to the court within thirty days after the entry of the order referring the case to the department[.]"

During the proceedings below, the circuit court ordered a twelve-month improvement period on July 13, 1993, causing the family case plan to become due in August, 1993. However, the Department did not complete the family case plan until November 2, 1993. Kim Peck explained the delay as follows: "I was unable to make enough contact with Nancy due to the amount of work I have and at time I didn't hear from Nancy. . . . Nancy and I always talked about what we were working on even though it wasn't in writing."

While this delay is not excusable, we do find Nancy S.E. was not harmed by the late filing of the family case plan. In Syllabus Point 4 of In the Interest of Carlita B., 185 W. Va. 613, 408 S.E.2d 365 (1991), we explained that the preparation of a family case plan is a joint venture between the parents and the Department:

> "In formulating the improvement period and family case plans, courts and social service workers should cooperate to provide a workable approach for the resolution of family problems which have prevented the child or children from receiving appropriate care from their parents. The formulation of the improvement period and family case plans should therefore be a consolidated, multi-disciplinary effort among the court system, the parents, attorneys, social service agencies, and any other helping personnel involved in assisting the family."

We recently reiterated this procedure in Syllabus Point 4 of In the Matter of Brian D., 194 W. Va. 623, 461 S.E.2d 129 (1995). The family case plan essentially serves as a map by which the parents, the Department, and the circuit court can chart the parents' progress during the improvement period. As a result, it is especially important to alert the parents as to what they must do in order to regain custody of their children. Although the family case plan should have been filed earlier in this case, both the Department and Nancy S.E. were obligated to work diligently to complete the case plan within the requisite thirty-day period. It further appears that prior to filing the case plan the Department maintained contact with Nancy S.E. and instructed her about the case plan's goals. Lastly, Nancy S.E. initially satisfied the requirements of the case plan, resulting in the return of her children at the end of her improvement period. Therefore, we find Nancy S.E. was not prejudiced by the Department's late filing of the family case plan.

Nancy S.E. further asserts the Department failed to show she did not comply with the requirements of the family case plan. Although the evidence suggests the Department proved Nancy S.E.'s noncompliance with the family case plan, the Department was not required to prove this point. "DHS [the Department of Human Services] is not obligated, as [Nancy S.E.] would have us believe, to prove its case by showing that she failed to comply with the family case plan." West Virginia Dept. of Human Servs. v. Peggy F., 184 W. Va. 60, 63, 399 S.E.2d 460, 463 (1990). Rather, Syllabus Point 1 of In the Interest of S.C., 168 W. Va. 366, 284 S.E.2d 867 (1981), recites the correct standard of proof in abuse and neglect cases:

> "W. Va. Code, 49-6-2(c) [1980], requires the State Department of Welfare [now the Department of Health and Human Resources], in a child abuse or neglect case, to prove 'conditions existing at the time of the filing of the petition . . . by clear and convincing proof.' The statute, however, does not specify any particular manner or mode of testimony or evidence by which the State Department of Welfare is obligated to meet this burden."

See also In re Christina L., 194 W. Va. 446, 460 S.E.2d 692 (1995). Moreover, we again emphasize what was made clear in Carlita B. 185 W. Va. at 626, 408 S.E.2d at 378:

> "As we explained in West Virginia Dept. of Human Serv. v. Peggy F., 184 W. Va. 60, 64, 399 S.E.2d 460, 464 (1990), it is possible for an individual to show 'compliance with specific aspects of the case plan' while failing 'to improve . . . [the] overall attitude and approach to parenting.' Thus, a judgment regarding the success of an improvement period is within the court's discretion regardless of whether or not the individual has completed all suggestions or goals set forth in family case plans.

'The improvement period is granted to allow the parent an opportunity to remedy the existing problems. The case plan simply provides an approach to solving them. As is clear from the language of the statute, . . . the ultimate goal is restoration of a stable family environment, not simply meeting the requirements of the case plan.'

Having previously determined that the circuit court did not err in concluding the Department satisfied its burden of proof, we decline to further address this issue.

III.
CONCLUSION

For the foregoing reasons, we affirm the decision of the Circuit Court of Raleigh County.

Affirmed.

Footnote: 1 We follow our traditional practice in child abuse and neglect matters, and other cases involving sensitive facts, and do not use the last names of the parties. See, e.g., In the Matter of Scottie D., 185 W. Va. 191, 406 S.E.2d 214 (1991); State ex rel. Division of Human Servs. by Mary C.M. v. Benjamin P.B., 183 W. Va. 220, 395 S.E.2d 220 (1990).

Footnote: 2 W. Va. Code, 49-6-1(a), states, in part:

"If the state department or a reputable person believes that a child is neglected or abused, the department or the person may present a petition setting forth the facts to the circuit court in the county in which the child resides, or to the judge of such court in vacation. The petition shall be verified by the oath of some credible person having knowledge of the facts. The petition shall allege specific conduct including time and place, how such conduct comes within the statutory definition of neglect or abuse with references thereto, any supportive services provided by the state department to remedy the alleged circumstances and the relief sought. Upon filing of the petition, the court shall set a time and place for a hearing and shall appoint counsel for the child."

Footnote: 3 W. Va. Code, 49-1-3(a), defines an "abused child":

"'Abused child' means a child whose health or welfare is harmed or threatened by:
"(1) A parent, guardian or custodian who knowingly or intentionally inflicts, attempts to inflict or knowingly allows another person to inflict, physical injury or mental or emotional injury, upon the child or another child in the home; or
"(2) Sexual abuse or sexual exploitation; or
"(3) The sale or attempted sale of a child by a parent, guardian, or custodian[.]"

W. Va. Code, 49-1-3(g)(1), defines a "neglected child":

"'Neglected child' means a child:
"(A) Whose physical or mental health is harmed or threatened by a present refusal, failure or inability of the child's parent, guardian or custodian to supply the child with necessary food, clothing, shelter, supervision, medical care or education, when such refusal, failure or inability is not due primarily to a lack of financial means on the part of the parent, guardian or custodian; or parent or custodian[.]"

The statute was amended in 1994. The minor changes do not affect our determination of this case.

Footnote: 4 Nancy S.E. and Brian S. were married at the time the Department filed the February, 1993, abuse and neglect petition. In August, 1993, Nancy S.E. divorced Brian S.

Footnote: 5 Brian S. ultimately was charged with twenty-three counts of sexual assault against Michael and Tiffany and against the sister of Nancy S.E. Subsequently, Brian S. pleaded guilty to four of these counts (involving Nancy S.E.'s sister) and received four one-to-five year sentences: two sentences to run concurrently and the remaining two sentences to run concurrently with each other, but consecutively to the first two sentences.

Footnote: 6 The record is unclear as to whether the circuit court informed Nancy S.E. of her right to have counsel appointed for her if she was indigent. See W. Va. Code, 49-6-2(a) (1992).

Footnote: 7 It should be noted that the circuit court did not refer to this custodial arrangement as an improvement period.

Footnote: 8 Michael is no longer a party to the abuse and neglect proceeding. By an agreed order entered September 14, 1994, Nancy S.E. voluntarily relinquished legal and physical custody of Michael to her mother, Judy R., thereby dismissing that portion of the Department's petition. Therefore, further reference to Michael is omitted.

Footnote: 9 This family case plan was signed by Kim Peck, a child protective services worker, on November 2, 1993, and by Nancy S.E. on March 17, 1994. Explaining this delay, Ms. Peck stated:

"I was unable to make enough contact with Nancy due to the amount of work I have and at times I didn't hear from Nancy. I give my court cases priority when doing family case plans and I am still unable to get them done in thirty days. Nancy and I always talked about what we were working on even though it wasn't in writing."

Footnote: 10 Nancy S.E. was represented by appointed counsel at all subsequent hearings in this matter.

Footnote: 11 Kim Peck reported in February, 1995, that "Nancy has not had contact with me on a regular basis. On January 18, 1995 Nancy called me and then I didn't hear from her again until February 15, 1995. Every time she gave me a phone number and I tried to call her, it would be disconnected."

Footnote: 12 The pertinent part of W. Va. Code, 49-6-1, is set forth in note 2, supra.

Footnote: 13 The pertinent part of W. Va. Code, 49-1-3, is set forth in note 3, supra.

Footnote: 14 The petition also sought to terminate the parental rights of Brian S. (Tiffany's father) and Jerry M. (Taylor's father). Because these individuals are not parties to the present appeal, we omit further discussion of their interests.

Footnote: 15 On the morning of May 1, 1995, Nancy S.E. left a message on her attorney's answering machine stating she was "stuck in Georgia." She did not further explain her anticipated absence.

Footnote: 16 Rule 8 of the Time Standards for Circuit Courts provides in full:

"Abuse and neglect proceedings.

"(a) Applicability. --- The time standards set forth in this rule are not intended to supersede, but to supplement, statutory provisions applicable to civil abuse and neglect proceedings.

"(b) Pre-adjudicatory motions. --- An order shall be entered on pre-adjudicatory motions within one week of hearing on the motion.

"(c) Preliminary hearing. --- If a preliminary hearing is held, it shall be conducted within two weeks from the filing of the petition.

"(d) Adjudication. --- Unless continued for good cause to a date certain or unless a pre-adjudicatory improvement period is granted, the adjudicatory order shall be entered within one month of the filing of the petition if the child is not in temporary custody. If a pre-adjudicatory improvement period is granted, the adjudicatory order shall be entered within two weeks of the end of the pre-adjudicatory improvement period.

"(e) Disposition. --- If abuse or neglect is found, the dispositional order placing the child shall be entered within six weeks of the adjudicatory order.

"(f) Post-adjudicatory improvement period. --- A further dispositional order shall be entered within two weeks of the end of the post-adjudicatory improvement period.

"(g) Monitoring improvement period. --- An assessment of the status of the child(ren) and the progress of the parent(s) towards satisfying the conditions of the improvement period shall be conducted on a monthly basis.

"(h) Modification. --- An order shall be entered on a motion to modify within one month of the filing of the motion.

"(i) Foster case review. --- A further dispositional order shall be entered within one month of the filing of a petition for foster care review.

"(j) Reporting standard. --- The reporting standard from the filing of the petition to disposition shall be twelve months."

Footnote: 17 Under our supervisory authority over circuit courts, we may require the courts to follow procedures deemed desirable from the viewpoint of sound judicial policy and practice although they are not specifically commanded by the Constitution or the Legislature.

Footnote: 18 During the spring of 1993, Nancy S.E. sent Tiffany to stay with a family friend; the Department placed Tiffany in foster care in August, 1993. In March, 1994, Nancy S.E. wished to permanently give Taylor to a different family friend; the Department placed Taylor in foster care on March 9, 1994, in preparation for this arrangement.

Footnote: 19 On July 4, 1994, the Department returned Taylor's full custody to Nancy S.E. and, on August 23, 1994, the Department returned Tiffany's full custody to Nancy S.E. While the circuit court did ultimately terminate Nancy S.E.'s parental rights, the Department did not seek termination until March, 1995, nearly one year after counsel was appointed to represent her.

Footnote: 20 Nancy S.E. contends that prior to the twelve-month improvement period the circuit court granted a ninety-day improvement period during the April 19, 1993, hearing. The record does not support this contention as the circuit court merely granted a ninety-day continuance of the status quo.

Footnote: 21 This is not to suggest that we in any way encourage agreed-upon extensions of improvement periods beyond the time allowed by statute. Furthermore, although the order granting the agreed improvement period extension reflects the guardian ad litem was present, the order gives no indication whether the guardian ad litem took a position on this issue. A guardian ad litem clearly has a right to enforce the child's statutory right to a limit on the extent and duration of improvement periods.

Footnote: 22 Rule 103(a) of the West Virginia Rules of Evidence (1996) provides in part:

"(a) Effect of erroneous ruling. --- Error may not be predicated upon a ruling which admits or excludes evidence unless a substantial right of the party is affected, and

Footnote: 23 In Hutchinson v. Montgomery Memorial Park Corp., 128 W. Va. 419, 424-25, 36 S.E.2d 889, 891-92 (1945), we set forth the showing a party ordinarily must make when seeking a continuance to obtain absent witnesses. This showing includes the substance of the desired testimony; the relevance of the testimony; that the testimony could be obtained if a continuance were granted; and due diligence was exercised to obtain the testimony prior to the date of the proceedings. Because the elements of the showing specified in Hutchinson are applicable to various factors which we have identified as relevant to our review, we address these elements as part of our broader inquiry.

Footnote: 24 In Morris, the Supreme Court observed that "[t]rial judges necessarily require a great deal of latitude in scheduling trials," 461 U.S. at 11, 103 S. Ct. at 1616, 75 L.Ed.2d at 619, not the least of which is that of assembling the witnesses and lawyers at the same time. This burden counsels against continuances except for compelling reasons.

Footnote: 25 Although the court summaries were made a part of the record in this case, it is unclear whether the circuit court admitted these reports into evidence. We admonish circuit courts that while these summaries are suitable to be made a part of the record in abuse and neglect cases, the better practice is to formally admit these reports into evidence to ensure that all the information regarding the progress of the case is properly before the courts.

Footnote: 26 As we expressed in In re Elizabeth Jo "Beth" H., 192 W. Va. 656, 659, 453 S.E.2d 639, 642 (1994):

"Consistent with our cases in other areas, we give appropriate deference to findings of the circuit court. In this regard, the circuit court has a superior sense of what actually transpired during an incident, by virtue of its ability to see and hear the witnesses who have firsthand knowledge of the events. Appellate oversight is therefore deferential, and we should review the circuit court's findings of fact following an evidentiary hearing under the clearly erroneous standard. If the circuit court makes no findings or applies the wrong legal standard, however, no deference attaches to such an application. Of course, if the circuit court's findings of fact are not clearly erroneous and the correct legal standard is applied, the circuit court's ultimate ruling will be affirmed as a matter of law."

SYLLABUS BY THE COURT

2. "'As a general rule the least restrictive alternative regarding parental rights to custody of a child . . . will be employed; however, courts are not required to exhaust every speculative possibility of parental improvement before terminating parental rights where it appears that the welfare of the child will be seriously threatened[.]' Syllabus point 1, in part, In re R.J.M., 164 W.Va. 496, 266 S.E.2d 114 (1980)." Syllabus Point 3, In re Aaron Thomas M., 212 W.Va. 604, 575 S.E.2d 214 (2002).

Per Curiam:

This case is before this Court upon appeal of a final order of the Circuit Court of Mingo County entered on March 24, 2003. Pursuant to that order, the circuit court terminated the parental rights of the appellant, Bobby F., to his children, Alexandria F. and Cheyenne F. In this appeal, the appellant contends that the evidence did not support termination of his parental rights. He further contends that, at a minimum, the circuit court erred by denying him post-termination visitation with his children.

This Court has before it the petition for appeal, the entire record, and the briefs and argument of counsel. For the reasons set forth below, the final order is reversed, and this case is remanded to the circuit court for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.

I.

FACTS

On February 21, 2002, the West Virginia Department of Health and Human Resources (hereinafter "DHHR") sought and obtained emergency custody of Tiffany P., born December 30, 1986; Robby P., born September 13, 1988; Alexandria F., born April 28, 1997; and Cheyenne F., born February 5, 2000. The children were residing with Bobby F. and

Christine P. who are the biological parents of Alexandria F. and Cheyenne F.[1] Tiffany P. and Robby P. are Christine P.'s children from prior relationships.[2]

The DHHR had previously provided services to this family in connection with an abuse and neglect proceeding involving one of Bobby F.'s other children, Austin S. Bobby F. intervened in that proceeding and was granted physical custody of Austin S. and Austin's half-sister, Christina S.,[3] on July 30, 2001.[4] At that time, Bobby F. was residing with Christine P. and the children who are the subject of this abuse and neglect proceeding. The DHHR became concerned after a social worker reported finding bruises and bite marks on Austin S. and Christina S. during a home visit. Follow-up visits caused further concern as the house was in poor physical condition, and Alexandria F. and Cheyenne F. appeared dirty and unkempt.

[1]Bobby F. is the biological father of six other children. Five of those children reside in North Carolina with their mother, Melissa D., to whom Bobby F. is still married. As discussed herein, Bobby F.'s parental rights to his other child, Austin S., were terminated in a separate abuse and neglect proceeding.

[2]Timothy Y. is the biological father of Tiffany P., and James P. is the biological father of Robby P. Both were parties to the proceedings below, but are not participating in this appeal. Likewise, Christine P. is not a party to this appeal. As discussed herein, the children were returned to her custody.

[3]Bobby F. is not Christina S.'s biological father.

[4]The parental rights of the mother of Austin S. and Christina S. were terminated. According to DHHR, Bobby F. intervened in that abuse and neglect case in an effort to obtain custody of Austin S.

On October 7, 2001, Christine P. phoned the abuse and neglect hotline and reported that Bobby F. had "taken off" two days ago and had not told her when he would be back. Christine P. said she believed that Bobby F. had quit taking his medication which had been prescribed to treat his diagnosis of paranoid schizophrenia. She was concerned because she had no parental or guardianship rights regarding Austin S. and Christina S., and therefore, could not sign any medical forms if the children needed treatment. As a result of this phone call, Austin S. and Christina S. were removed from the home. Subsequently, Bobby F.'s parental rights to Austin S. were terminated in a separate abuse and neglect proceeding.

The DHHR continued to provide services to the family, and on November 5, 2001, a social worker made another home visit. Bobby F. was at the home visiting the children. The social worker reported finding bruises on both Alexandria F. and Cheyenne F. The family said that a dog had bit Alexandria F. and that Cheyenne F. had fallen on the steps. About the same time, Tiffany P. reported that Bobby F. had cut himself with a knife in front of them. Christine P. said that she believed that Bobby F. was still not taking his medication, and she agreed to keep him out of the home.

However, about a month later, Bobby F. went to the DHHR office and said he wanted to move back home with Christine P. and the children. He indicated that he was now taking his medication. Two weeks later, though, Christine P. reported that she and Bobby

F. got into a fight in front of the children because he tried to take her food stamps. Christine P. had a bite mark on her wrist and a chipped tooth. She said there was a warrant for Bobby F.'s arrest for domestic battery. Christine P. was told that she could not allow Bobby F. to come near the children.

Finally, on February 7, 2002, the DHHR learned that both Bobby F. and Christine P. had been arrested. The record is not complete regarding the details of the arrests, but it appears that Christine P. was driving a car with Tiffany P. and Bobby F. as passengers. A police officer saw Bobby F. and attempted to stop the car because of the outstanding warrant for his arrest. However, Christine P. refused to pull over and a high speed chase ensued. Eventually, the car was stopped and both Christine P. and Bobby F. were arrested. Shortly thereafter, the DHHR filed the emergency petition and removed the children from the home.

An adjudicatory hearing was held on September 18, 2002. During the hearing, the court was advised that Bobby F. had recently been arrested for petit larceny and giving false information. The arresting police officer reported that he found four generic pain pills in Bobby F.'s pocket when he served the arrest warrants. Bobby F. did not have a prescription for the medication. At the end of the hearing, the court found that the children were abused and neglected. However, the children were returned to the physical custody of Christine P. The court further ordered that Bobby F.'s supervised visitation should continue.

On October 21, 2001, the court conducted the disposition hearing. The DHHR did not recommend termination of the parental rights of any of the parents involved in this case. Instead, the DHHR indicated that the children should remain in Christine P.'s custody. However, the DHHR continued to express concern regarding Bobby F.'s behavior, and thus, recommended that he only be permitted to have supervised visitation with the children. Thereafter, the court entered the final order on March 24, 2003. Christine P. was granted legal and physical custody of the children, and Bobby F.'s parental rights were terminated. Bobby F. was not granted post-termination visitation with his children. This appeal followed.

II.

STANDARD OF REVIEW

As set forth above, Bobby F. appeals the termination of his parental rights and the denial of post-termination visitation with his children. This Court recently explained in In re Emily, 208 W.Va. 325, 332, 540 S.E.2d 542, 549 (2000) that, "For appeals resulting from abuse and neglect proceedings, such as the case sub judice, we employ a compound standard of review: conclusions of law are subject to a de novo review, while findings of fact are weighed against a clearly erroneous standard." Also, in Syllabus Point 1 of In the Interest of: Tiffany Marie S., 196 W.Va. 223, 470 S.E.2d 177 (1996), this Court held that:

> Although conclusions of law reached by a circuit court are subject to de novo review, when an action, such as an abuse and neglect case, is tried upon the facts without a jury, the circuit court shall make a determination based upon the evidence and shall make findings of fact and conclusions of law as to whether such child is abused or neglected. These findings shall not be set aside by a reviewing court unless clearly erroneous. A finding is clearly erroneous when, although there is evidence to support the finding, the reviewing court on the entire evidence is left with the definite and firm conviction that a mistake has been committed. However, a reviewing court may not overturn a finding simply because it would have decided the case differently, and it must affirm a finding if the circuit court's account of the evidence is plausible in light of the record viewed in its entirety.

With these standards in mind, we now consider whether the circuit court erred in this case.

III.

DISCUSSION

Bobby F. contends that the evidence does not support termination of his parental rights. He asserts that the circuit court based its decision upon erroneous findings of fact. He maintains that there is no clear and convincing evidence that he neglected or abused his children.

This Court has held that, "'As a general rule the least restrictive alternative regarding parental rights to custody of a child . . . will be employed; however, courts are not required to exhaust every speculative possibility of parental improvement before terminating parental rights where it appears that the welfare of the child will be seriously threatened[.]' Syllabus point 1, in part, In re R.J.M., 164 W.Va. 496, 266 S.E.2d 114 (1980)." Syllabus Point 3, In re Aaron Thomas M., 212 W.Va. 604, 575 S.E.2d 214 (2002). Having carefully reviewed the record, we agree that the evidence in this case does not warrant termination of Bobby F.'s parental rights. Instead, we believe that the circuit court should have ordered supervised visitation as recommended by the DHHR.

During the dispositional proceedings below, the DHHR did not recommend termination of Bobby F.'s parental rights.[5] The guardian ad litem agreed with that decision. The Children's Case Plan, which was submitted prior to the dispositional hearing, stated that:

> The [DHHR] recognizes that Bobby [F.] is the biological father to the children Alex[andria] and Cheyenne [F.] Although [Bobby F.] has had his parental rights terminated to another child, the [DHHR] recognizes that the situation in this case is somewhat different and does not recommend parental termination at this time. The [DHHR] recognizes that [Bobby F.] has a strong bond with Alex[andria] and Cheyenne and has helped in the rearing of the children; however, the [DHHR] does not feel that [Bobby F.] could adequately take care of the children alone and should therefore not be considered as a primary caretaker. [Bobby F.] has a history of mental illness and > a history of not taking his prescription medication. [Bobby F.] also has a criminal background and currently has criminal charges pending against him. [Bobby F.] has been around drugs and has committed domestic assault against [Christine P.] [Bobby F.] has also displayed inappropriate behaviors in front of the children. Based on those concerns, while the [DHHR] does not recommend parental termination at this time, the [DHHR] does recommend that [Bobby F.] stay away from the residence of [Christine P.] and the said children. The [DHHR] recommends that [Bobby F.] receive supervised visitation at the discretion of [Christine P.]

The record clearly supports this disposition. As noted above, the children were returned to the custody of Christine P. upon the circuit court finding that the conditions that warranted the removal of the children from the home had been resolved. Bobby F. and Christine P. ended their relationship, and Bobby F. is no longer a custodial parent of the children.

In addition, there is no evidence in the record that Bobby F. abused his children. The final order of the circuit court states that some of the children suffered bruises and bites while in Bobby F.'s custody. However, at the preliminary hearing in this matter, DHHR's child protective services worker testified that she concluded that Cheyenne F. was biting the other children. She did not believe that either Bobby F. or Christine P. was abusing the children. Rather, she was concerned about a lack of supervision.

This court is certainly mindful of Bobby F.'s criminal history. As noted above, a domestic battery warrant was issued as a result of an altercation with Christine P. Bobby F. was also arrested for petit larceny. These facts must be considered when making a determination concerning whether or not to terminate parental rights. However, this Court has held that, "'A natural parent of an infant child does not forfeit his or her parental right to the custody of the child merely by reason of having been convicted of one or more charges of criminal offenses.' Syllabus point 2, State ex rel. Acton v. Flowers, 154 W.Va. 209, 174 S.E.2d 742 (1970)." Syllabus Point 7, In re Emily, 208 W.Va. 325, 540 S.E.2d 542 (2000).

In light of all of the above, we do not believe that the least restrictive alternative in this case was termination of Bobby F.'s parental rights. Since Bobby F. is no longer a custodial parent, we are unable to find that the welfare of the children will be seriously threatened absent termination of his parental rights. While Bobby F.'s actions, conduct, and behavior cause this Court great concern, the record in this case leads us to conclude that termination of his parental rights was not in the best interests of the children. In that regard, the record shows that Bobby F. has a strong bond with his children and that, until these proceedings were instituted, he was actively involved in caring for and raising his children. While this case was pending below, Bobby F. exercised his right to see his children, missing only two scheduled visitations. On numerous occasions, this Court has indicated that the best interest of the children is the polar star in the resolution of abuse and neglect cases. See Michael K.T. v. Tina L.T., 182 W.Va. 399, 405, 387 S.E.2d 866, 872 (1989) ("[T]he best interests of the child is the polar star by which decisions must be made which affect children."); Syllabus Point 1, State ex rel. Cash v. Lively, 155 W.Va. 801, 187 S.E.2d 601 (1972) ("'In a contest involving the custody of an infant the welfare of the child is the polar star by which the discretion of the court will be guided.' Point 2, Syllabus, State ex rel. Lipscomb v. Joplin, 131 W.Va. 302 [47 S.E.2d 221]."). Given the circumstances of this case, while it is clear from the evidence that Bobby F. should never be the custodial parent, we are unable to see how the children would benefit from the termination of Bobby F.'s parental rights at this juncture.

While we find that termination of parental rights is not appropriate in this case, we also believe that Bobby F.'s visitation with his children must be supervised. Bobby F. suffers from a serious mental illness, and in the past, he has exhibited very inappropriate behavior in front of the children including cutting himself with a knife. For that reason, his visitation with the children must be closely, strictly, and constantly supervised. To that end, we remand this case to the circuit court for entry of an order consistent with this opinion that will provide that any visitation of Bobby F. with these children must be strictly supervised.[6]

IV.

[6]In light of this decision, we need not address Bobby F.'s assignment of error relating to the denial of post-termination visitation.

CONCLUSION

Accordingly, for the reasons set forth above, the final order of the Circuit Court of Mingo County entered on March 24, 2003, is reversed, and this case is remanded to the circuit court for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.

Reversed and remanded.

Starcher, Justice, concurring:

I concur in the Court's opinion and judgment. I write separately to point out that the father in this case, Bobby F., has been diagnosed with schizophrenia and was not taking his prescribed medication.

Schizophrenia, a serious neurological brain disorder, strikes one out of one hundred people worldwide, with the usual onset of symptoms coming between the ages of 13 and 25. Like diabetes, there is no cure – only treatment, which is basically medication to relieve the symptoms of psychosis, disorganized thoughts, etc. The cause of schizophrenia is unknown, although there is some genetic-based component. Some of my best friends have adult children with schizophrenia.

Many people with schizophrenia "do well" if they consistently take prescribed medicine. (However, a substantial percentage, unfortunately, do not do well, despite the best treatment.) But many people with schizophrenia have a substantially diminished or no appreciation of the fact that they have an illness. These people often do not take prescribed medications, through no fault of their own.

The consequences of schizophrenia for patients, families, and our society – particularly untreated schizophrenia – are enormous. Most people with the illness are cared for by their families; many others are isolated and/or homeless. For many family members and other treatment and care providers, getting a person who has schizophrenia to "voluntarily" take their medicine can be a very difficult – or impossible – task. The result is often a spiral into psychosis and expensive involuntary hospitalization.

Fortunately, new laws like "Kendra's Law" in New York have drastically reduced episodes of psychosis, violence, and homelessness among non-compliant patients – by using court orders and assertive community treatment as a less-restrictive alternative, to encourage patients with schizophrenia to take prescribed medicine.

In the instant case, the whole sorry series of events might have been avoided if Bobby F. had been required by a court order to take his prescribed medicine.

I pray that we will soon implement better laws in West Virginia to help health care providers and families and patients like Bobby F. and his children.

6. In cases involving the abuse and neglect of children, when it appears from this Court's review of the record on appeal that the health and welfare of a child may be at risk as a result of the child's custodial placement, regardless of whether that placement is an issue raised in the appeal, this Court will take such action as it deems appropriate and necessary to protect that child.

LOUGHRY, Justice:

This case is before this Court upon the appeal of the petitioner, Norma G.,[1] from the Circuit Court of Greenbrier County's August 16, 2012, order terminating her parental rights to her children, Timber M. and Reuben M. The petitioner asserts that her due process rights have been violated, that no imminent danger existed at the time her children were taken into custody, that she should have been granted an improvement period, and that the lower court failed to impose the least restrictive alternative disposition so as to protect the best interests of her children. Based upon the record, the parties' briefs, and the arguments presented, we find no error. Accordingly, we affirm the termination of Norma G.'s parental rights; however, we remand for a determination of whether the permanent placement of the children with their biological father is appropriate.

I. Factual and Procedural Background

On August 9, 2011, Timber M., born on December 25, 2002, disclosed to her mother, the petitioner, Norma G. ("the mother"), that her stepfather, Jack G., had been showing her pornographic movies on a portable DVD player when she was with him in his truck. Timber also disclosed that Jack G. had exposed his genitals to her in a shed where the family kept their bicycles and that he attempted to coerce her into watching him masturbate. The mother testified below that on August 10, 2011, she instructed Timber on how to use her cell phone to make an audio recording. She then encouraged the eight-year-old Timber to go with Jack G. in his truck in hopes that Timber would be able to record his sexual abuse of her. The mother further testified that Timber did record a conversation with Jack G. regarding the pornographic videos.

The mother also testified that on August 12, 2011, she sent a text message to the cell phone of Corporal Roger Baker of the Greenbrier County Sheriff's Department[2] regarding Timber's recent disclosures and arranged to meet with him on August 15, 2011. The mother testified that the day before she was to meet with Cpl. Baker, she confronted Jack G., who admitted his misconduct with regard to Timber. The mother alleges that she told Jack G. to leave the home, but that he refused. She further testified that the following day, Cpl. Baker did not appear for their meeting. Cpl. Baker testified below that he did not remember receiving a text message from the mother on August 12, 2011.

The mother alleges that she protected Timber M. and Reuben M.[3] by moving her mother and her stepfather into the home and by ensuring the children were never alone with Jack G. However, the testimony of the mother's stepfather revealed that he and his wife moved into another structure on the property–not into the family home. Further, the children revealed during these proceedings that contrary to the mother's testimony, they were left alone with Jack G. following Timber's disclosure.[4]

On December 20, 2011, more than four months after Jack G. admitted to the mother that he had abused Timber, the mother contacted Cpl. Baker to report the abuse and the fact that she could not get Jack G. to leave the home. On this same day, Jack G. gave a statement to Cpl. Baker during which he confessed to showing Timber pornographic movies and to exposing his genitals to her. Cpl. Baker made arrangements for Timber to undergo a forensic interview at the Child and Youth Advocacy Center ("CYAC") in Greenbrier County, and he also contacted Child Protective Services ("CPS") of the West Virginia Department of Health and Human Resources ("the Department"). The forensic interview of Timber was conducted on December 21, 2011, during which she disclosed the same allegations of sexual abuse by her stepfather, Jack G.

Also, on December 21, 2011, the mother was interviewed by a Department employee and CYAC workers during which she admitted that she had known about the

[4]The record contains a Court Appointed Special Advocate report dated February 2, 2012, which reflects that Timber told the guardian ad litem in this case that: "My Mommy told me to tell you that I was never alone with Jack after I told her [about the abuse]."

sexual abuse of Timber since August 9, 2011. She explained that she had taken matters into her own hands due to what she perceived were prior failures of the Department[5] and law enforcement to take action. The mother admitted that she had provided Timber with a cellular telephone so that the child could record Jack G.'s abuse of her, and that she then used the recording to persuade Jack G. to convey his real property[6] to her and to leave the home. Although Jack G. conveyed the property to her, he refused to leave.

On December 20, 2011, Jack G. was arrested and admitted to the sexual abuse of Timber. The following day, the Department removed the children from the home and an order ratifying emergency custody was entered in the Greenbrier County Magistrate Court.[7] [5]It appears that the mother is referencing the referral made to CPS on August 3, 2011, by Lorie Tilley, a person who attends the same church as the mother and the children. Ms. Tilley testified that she reported her suspicion that Timber M. was being abused, including sexual abuse, based upon disclosures made by Timber to Ms. Tilley's daughter, but that she had mistakenly identified the suspected abuser as Timber's biological father, Kevin M. Contrary to Ms. Tilley's testimony below, the Department alleges that its documentation on this referral did not contain any allegations of a sexual nature and that the referral was "screened out" because the allegations did not meet the "legal standard for abuse/neglect." The mother is also referencing her multiple referrals to CPS against Kevin M. between 2004 and 2008, following her separation from Kevin, which CPS found were either unsubstantiated or did not meet the statutory definition of abuse and/or neglect. While there are multiple references in the record to the parents' divorce, the mother testified that she was never married to Kevin M.

[6]It appears from the record that this property consisted of more than 100 acres in Greenbrier County.

[7]The record contains a Social Summary dated January 24, 2012, prepared by CPS worker Davina Agee, which reflects that the children were initially placed with a paternal (continued...)

On December 22, 2011, the Department filed a verified Petition to Institute Child Abuse and Neglect Proceedings in the Circuit Court of Greenbrier County.[8] The Department alleged, inter alia, that the conduct constituting abuse and/or neglect[9] included that the mother knew of the sexual abuse of Timber by Jack G. but failed to protect her daughter and allowed her to be alone with the stepfather. The Department also alleged that uncle, then briefly with foster parents, and then with a maternal uncle and aunt, where they remained until disposition.

[8]On December 22, 2011, the circuit court entered an Initial Order Upon Filing of Petition in which it transferred custody of the children to the Department; appointed counsel for the mother, the father, Kevin M., and the stepfather, Jack G.; appointed a guardian ad litem to represent the children; and directed the Department to convene a Multi-Disciplinary Team. On January 4, 2012, the circuit court entered an Order Appointing Court Appointed Special Advocate to independently gather information into the circumstances of the children.

[9]West Virginia Code § 49-1-3(1)(A) (2009 & Supp. 2012) defines an "abused child," in relevant part, as one "whose health or welfare is harmed or threatened by: (A) A parent . . . who knowingly or intentionally inflicts, attempts to inflict or knowingly allows another person to inflict, physical injury or mental or emotional injury, upon the child or another child in the home." Further, > her in danger by allowing the sexual abuser to have unsupervised access to Timber [M.].

> [w]here there is clear and convincing evidence that a child has suffered physical and/or sexual abuse while in the custody of his or her parent(s), guardian, or custodian, another child residing in the home when the abuse took place who is not a direct victim of the physical and/or sexual abuse but is at risk of being abused is an abused child under W.Va. Code, 49-1-3(a) (1994).

A preliminary hearing was held on January 4, 2012. At this hearing, the mother stipulated that at the time the children were removed from her home, probable cause existed that they were in imminent danger due to the distribution of obscene matter by the children's stepfather, Jack G., and due to her failure to protect the children.

In a Social Summary dated January 24, 2012, which was filed in the circuit court, CPS worker Davina Agee stated, as follows:

> The psychological and emotional well being of these children are paramount. . . . At this point, Timber [M.] has been sexually groomed by Jack [G.]. After telling her mother, Norma, about the abuse, the child was forced to live in the same house every day with her abuser for three[10] months, while Norma extorted Jack for property. That during the past three months, the children were not just made to live in the same house with Jack, but were also left alone with him on several occasions. Therefore, Norma, knowingly allowed unsupervised contact between her child and her abuser, and in doing so, Norma acted with complete disregard for Timber's well being, physical safety and mental/emotional needs.

(Footnote added).

On February 8, 2012, the mother filed a motion for a post-adjudicatory improvement period in which she relied upon the report of her forensic psychiatric evaluator,

[10]As indicated previously, this time period was actually in excess of four months.

Bobby Miller, M.D., which stated that although the mother was not currently capable of providing adequate parenting to her children due to her "admitted poor judgment and parental inaction[,]" she could possibly be successful in an improvement period with special accommodations, such as the appointment of someone to act as mediator between her and the Department.

On February 17, 2012, the parties appeared before the circuit court for an adjudicatory hearing with the understanding that the mother would stipulate to the allegations of abuse and neglect upon which the Department would recommend an improvement period.[11] However, during this hearing, the mother would not admit that she had abused her children. Thereafter, a contested adjudicatory hearing was held on May 22, 2012, during which Cpl. Baker testified that after the mother contacted him on December 20, 2011, she told him that she had confronted her husband, Jack G., and told him, "here's what you're going to do, you're going to sign the farm over to us, and then you're going to leave, and I'm not going to go to the police." Cpl. Baker also testified that when he asked the mother whether Jack G. had, in fact, conveyed the farm to her, she responded, "yeah, I own it lock, stock, and barrel." CYAC employees testified similarly and noted that Jack G.'s refusal to leave the home after he conveyed the farm to the mother was the reason she contacted law enforcement on December 20, 2011.

During the course of the May 22, 2012, hearing, the mother testified that she did not believe that Timber was in danger when she allowed her to get into a vehicle alone with Jack G., after she had disclosed the abuse. The mother testified that Jack G. "had not been violent. He had not done anything. She had already seen the [pornographic] videos. I felt that it was the only way I was going to . . . catch him." She further testified that Jack G. conveyed his farm to her shortly after she confronted him about Timber in August 2011. When asked whether she contacted law enforcement or the Department during the four months between Timber's disclosure on August 9, 2011, and when she contacted Cpl. Baker on December 20, 2011, the mother responded, "No, like I said what good would it have done. They didn't respond the first time."[12]

[12]On June, 25, 2012, the Court Appointed Special Advocate director, Jenny Castle, filed a report with the circuit court in which she commented on the mother's four-month delay in contacting law enforcement, as follows:

> Was this due to the time it took to transfer all the titles and deeds over into her name? Why was she no longer "afraid" that he (Cpl. Baker) would not help her? How after this amount of time did she develop the "trust" in the system to call for assistance in removing [Jack G.] (because he refused to leave) yet when she was questioned about her responsibility of not protecting her children she immediately turned back to not being able to "trust the system"?

Ms. Castle further commented in this regard that she was "unaware of any specific treatment

On May 30, 2012, the circuit court entered an Order Following Adjudicatory Hearing in which it found that:

> 3. [The mother] had failed to protect the children from a known sexual abuser.
> 4. Reuben was at risk for being abused while remaining in the home with Jack [G.].
> 5. [The mother] knowingly allowed Jack [G.] to sexually exploit Timber.
> 6. [The mother] placed Timber at risk for further abuse while remaining in the home with Jack [G.].
> 7. Pursuant to West Virginia Code §49-6-2(c) there is clear and convincing evidence that, based upon the conditions existing at the time of the petition, the children have been abused as defined in West Virginia Code §49-1-3.

On July 24, 2012, a hearing was held on the mother's motion for a post-adjudicatory improvement period. During this hearing, Dr. Miller testified that not only did the mother not think that she had done anything wrong, but that she also believed that "she was actually justified in doing what she did." He added, "I still think she doesn't fully grasp that what she did was not the appropriate thing to do." During the mother's testimony, she again refused to acknowledge that her actions following Timber's disclosure constituted or program that would teach a parent not to allow their child to be continuously abused by living with her perpetrator in order to gain a $350,000 farm and all its equipment."

abuse of her children. Both the Department and the children's guardian ad litem ("GAL") asked that the mother's motion for a post-adjudicatory improvement period be denied. Thereafter, in the circuit court order denying the mother's motion, the court found, as follows:

> [T]he [mother] failed to demonstrate, by clear and convincing evidence, that she is likely to fully participate in the improvement period. Although [the mother] testified that she is willing to participate . . . in an improvement period, the Court finds that she has yet to take responsibility for her actions or inactions and acknowledge that her failure to protect the children constituted abuse to the children. Due to the [mother's] failure to acknowledge the existence of any problem the Court finds granting an improvement period would be futile at this point in the proceedings.

The case then moved forward to the disposition hearing, which was held on August 14, 2012. During this hearing, CPS worker Crystal Stock testified that the termination of the mother's parental rights was in the children's best interest and that there was no reasonable likelihood that the conditions of abuse and neglect could be corrected because of the mother's failure to admit that there are any problems.[13] The Court Appointed Special Advocate director, Jenny Castle, testified similarly. When asked during this hearing whether she had abused her children, the mother responded that Jack G. abused her children and that she could not say that she had abused them. Thereafter, the Department and the [13]The Department states that it offered the mother the opportunity to participate in parenting and adult life skills, but those services were refused.

GAL advised the circuit court that they sought the termination of the mother's parental rights. The mother's counsel asked the circuit court to "terminate [the mother's] right to physical custody and terminate [the mother's] right to visitation . . . [but] leave the parental rights intact."[14] At the conclusion of the disposition hearing, the circuit court stated as follows:

> What brought this family into court in the first place is the lack on the part of their mother in the - - a fundamental requirement of every parent, and that is to have a basic fundamental understanding of what is reasonably necessary to protect children, and in this case protect young children and a daughter who's been exposed and . . . who was required to live in a household of an abuser . . . although [the mother] says, yes, she made a mistake . . . [,] the mistake would be corrected by gaining an insight, understanding as to what her obligation as to the children's mother is to provide basic protection from abusers and from sex offenders . . . .

The circuit court further explained that > everyone it appears to be with the exception of [the mother] has worked towards focusing on the best interests of the children and tried to get this resolved but we couldn't get over that initial hurdle, and there's just simply no reason why the department should continue to expend resources for [the mother] if she's not willing to absorb and incorporate and make it a part of who she is, and this hasn't been evidenced from the get-go and so it's not really a tough decision at all. . . . I see no reasonable alternative other than to terminate her rights as their parent, and it doesn't mean that they don't have a right to have continued contact as it is in their best interest with their mother and reasonable [14]The Department argued that a termination of the mother's custodial rights to her children, but not her parental rights in their entirety, would leave the door open for the mother to seek custody at a later time, which would not achieve permanency for the children. The Department further argued that permanency would be best achieved by placing the children with their biological father and terminating the parental rights of the mother.

> visitation . . . and that [the father] can . . . allow the children to have supervision with their mother as is in their best interests.[15]

(Footnote added).

On August 16, 2012, the circuit court entered a dispositional order accepting the children's permanency plan filed by the Department. The circuit court found that the mother is "presently unwilling to adequately provide for the children's needs[;]" that "[t]here is no reasonable likelihood that the conditions of abuse can be substantially corrected in the near future[;]" that the mother "has failed to comply with the requirements to rectify the conditions of abuse[;]" that she "has repeatedly failed to acknowledge that her actions constituted abuse of the children[;]" and that she "has failed to recognize that she failed to protect her children and that she does not have the capacity to recognize and remedy that failure in the near future." The circuit court found the welfare and best interests of the children required the termination of the mother's parental rights to Timber M. and Reuben M., and the court granted both physical and legal custody of the children to their biological father, Kevin M.

[15]During oral argument, counsel stated that the mother visits with her children every Sunday in Kevin M.'s home and she has the opportunity for telephone contact with them during the week.

II. Standard of Review

We are asked to review a circuit court's order entered upon a petition for termination of parental rights. We have previously stated that abuse and neglect proceedings will be evaluated under a "compound standard of review: conclusions of law are subject to a de novo review, while findings of fact are weighed against a clearly erroneous standard." In re Emily, 208 W.Va. 325, 332, 540 S.E.2d 542, 549 (2000). Indeed, our standard of review in this regard is well established:

> "Although conclusions of law reached by a circuit court are subject to de novo review, when an action, such as an abuse and neglect case, is tried upon the facts without a jury, the circuit court shall make a determination based upon the evidence and shall make findings of fact and conclusions of law as to whether such child is abused or neglected. These findings shall not be set aside by a reviewing court unless clearly erroneous. A finding is clearly erroneous when, although there is evidence to support the finding, the reviewing court on the entire evidence is left with the definite and firm conviction that a mistake has been committed. However, a reviewing court may not overturn a finding simply because it would have decided the case differently, and it must affirm a finding if the circuit court's account of the evidence is plausible in light of the record viewed in its entirety." Syl. Pt. 1, In Interest of Tiffany Marie S., 196 W.Va. 223, 470 S.E.2d 177 (1996).

Syl. Pt. 1, In re Cecil T., 228 W.Va. 89, 717 S.E.2d 873 (2011). With these standards in mind, the parties' arguments will be considered.

III. Discussion

In the present appeal, the mother asserts that the Department violated her due process rights by repeatedly ignoring applicable statutes, procedural rules, and the Department's Child Protective Services Policy manual ("policy manual").[16] She also asserts that the circuit court failed to protect the best interests of the children by failing to employ a dispositional alternative that was less restrictive than a termination of her parental rights. Further, the mother argues that because Jack G. was removed from the home on December 20, 2011, there was no imminent danger warranting the removal of the children from the home on December 21, 2011. Lastly, the mother asserts that she was denied a meaningful opportunity to request and participate in an improvement period.

> We begin our analysis of these issues by acknowledging that
> "[i]n the law concerning custody of minor children, no rule is more firmly established than that the right of a natural parent to the custody of his or her infant child is paramount to that of any other person; it is a fundamental personal liberty protected and [16]The mother also makes general references to the Department violating the "Gibson decree" in her appellate brief. The Department states that the "Gibson decree" is an amended consent decree entered in Gibson v. Ginsberg, No. 78-2375 (S.D.W.Va. Sept. 28, 1981), and that its terms have been incorporated into its policy manual in an effort to fully comply with its requirements. Because the mother fails to provide any analysis concerning this decree in her appellate brief, her references to the same are addressed herein only to the extent that the Gibson decree has been incorporated into the Department's policy manual. See State, Dept. of Health v. Robert Morris N., 195 W.Va. 759, 765, 466 S.E.2d 827, 833 (1995) ("[a] skeletal 'argument,' really nothing more than an assertion, does not preserve a claim . . . . Syl. Pt. 2, Lindsie D.L. v. Richard W.S., 214 W.Va. 750, 591 S.E.2d 308 (2003). We must also be mindful, however, of our basic tenet that "[a]lthough parents have substantial rights that must be protected, the primary goal in cases involving abuse and neglect, as in all family law matters, must be the health and welfare of the children." A. Denial of due process.

The mother contends that she was denied due process because the Department allegedly ignored applicable statutes and rules of procedure, as well as its policy manual and its pamphlet titled: "A Parent's Guide to Working with Child Protective Services" ("pamphlet"). In particular, the mother asserts that the Department (1) failed to inform her of her right to counsel before interviewing her on December 20, 2011; (2) failed to notify her of the time and place of the emergency custody ratification hearing or her opportunity to be present for the same; and (3) failed to file either a family functioning assessment as required by Department policy, a family case plan as required by West Virginia Code § 49-6-2(b), or a child case plan as required by West Virginia Code § 49-6-5, all of which deprived both her and the circuit court of necessary information. We find no merit in the mother's argument.

Regarding the right to counsel, the Department's policy manual simply requires its employee to ask the parent whether he or she has counsel and, if so, to contact the lawyer before interviewing the parent.[17] As the Department argues, and as we agree, the policy manual does not confer upon any parent additional procedural due process rights not already provided under existing law. Further, the Department's informational pamphlet merely describes a court appointing counsel after a legal proceeding has been instituted, which is consistent with West Virginia Code § 49-6-2(a) (2009 & Supp. 2012).[18] In short, the mother does not point to any law that affords a parent the right to counsel pre-petition. Moreover, the circuit court appointed counsel to represent the mother the same day the Department filed the abuse and neglect petition. For these reasons, we conclude that there was no denial of due process to the mother in this regard.

[17]Although it is unclear from the record whether the Department worker asked the mother whether she was represented by counsel at the time of her initial interview, the mother does not claim that she was represented by counsel at that time. Consequently, her interview would have proceeded in the manner in which it did in any event.

[18]West Virginia Code § 49-6-2(a) requires the circuit court to advise a parent of his or her right to be represented by counsel in a child abuse and neglect proceeding and to appoint counsel if the parent cannot afford counsel.

We next address the issue of notice of the emergency ratification hearing. When the Department takes a child into emergency custody, the Department worker is required to immediately apply for an order ratifying the emergency custody under West Virginia Code § 49-6-3(c) (2009 & Supp. 2012) . This statute provides, in pertinent part, that "[t]he parents . . . of the child or children may be present at the time and place of application for an order ratifying custody . . . ." Id. (emphasis added). This statute further provides that "if at the time the . . . children are taken into custody . . . the worker knows which judge or referee is to receive the application [to ratify emergency custody], the worker shall so inform the parents . . . ." Id. The mother argues that the Department worker could have easily ascertained the time and place of the application. The Department asserts that assuming, arguendo, that the mother did not receive notice of the hearing, she has failed to show how she was harmed, and that her failure to raise this issue below deprived the circuit court of the opportunity to address it. Further, we note that during the preliminary hearing, the mother stipulated that at the time the children were removed from the home, probable cause existed that they were in imminent danger due to the distribution of pornographic material by the children's stepfather, Jack G., and her failure to protect the children.[19] Thus, under these circumstances, we again find that the mother was not denied due process.

[19]These admissions by the mother at the preliminary hearing also dispense with her argument that imminent danger no longer existed at the time the children were removed from the home on December 21, 2011.

With respect to the mother's argument that she was denied due process by the Department's failure to prepare a family functioning assessment and various case plans, we first note that a family functioning assessment is a tool the Department employs to assess the risk to children in a home. Here, as the Department argues, such an assessment became unnecessary when the children were removed from the home due to imminent danger findings made just hours after the Department's investigation began.[20] With regard to the mother's argument that the Department failed to prepare a family case plan under West Virginia Code § 49-6-2(b) (2009) (Supp. 2012), this statute provides, in pertinent part, as follows:

> In any proceeding brought pursuant to the provisions of this article, the court may grant any respondent an improvement period in accord with the provisions of this article. . . . An order granting such improvement period shall require the department to prepare and submit to the court a family case plan in accordance with the provisions of section three, article six-d of this chapter.

(Emphasis added). It is clear from this statute that the family case plan requirement is triggered by a court granting an improvement period.[21] Here, as the Department argues, there [20]The Department alleges that, although unnecessary, it ultimately prepared a family functioning assessment when the mother requested one. In preparing the assessment, the Department utilized information from its file concerning the events and its investigation.

[21]At the time these proceedings were instituted, West Virginia Code § 49-6D-3(a) (2009 & Supp. 2012) required the Department to prepare a family case plan within thirty days of an improvement period being granted to a person who had been referred to the Department. Again, here, an improvement period was not granted. While not argued by the parties herein, in 2012, this statute was amended to require the preparation of a "unified child was no need for the Department to prepare a family case plan under West Virginia Code § 49-6-2(b) because no improvement period was granted. Regarding the child's case plan, West Virginia Code § 49-6-5(a) (2009) (Supp. 2012) provides that following a determination that a child is abused or neglected, > the department shall file with the court a copy of the child's case plan, including the permanency plan for the child. . . . Copies of the child's case plan shall be sent to the child's attorney and parent, guardian or custodian or their counsel at least five days prior to the dispositional hearing.

[Emphasis added]. The Department filed the children's permanency plan the day prior to the disposition hearing; thus, it was untimely. Id. The record reflects that although the mother was offered a brief continuance given the late filing of this plan, the mother's counsel advised the circuit court that the mother wished to proceed with the disposition. For this reason, we find that the mother was not denied due process in the proceedings below.

and family case plan" within thirty days of a parent being allowed an improvement period or within sixty days of a child being placed into foster care, whichever occurs first. This amendment became effective June 7, 2012. The Department's submission of a case plan to the circuit court on August 13, 2012, substantially complied with the time line in this amendment. Even assuming, arguendo, that it did not, the mother did not object to the plan submitted on this basis; therefore, she has waived any argument in that regard.

B. Denial of an improvement period

Next, the mother asserts that the circuit court erred in denying her an improvement period. As we have previously explained,

> [I]n order to remedy the abuse and/or neglect problem, the problem must first be acknowledged. Failure to acknowledge the existence of the problem, i.e., the truth of the basic allegation pertaining to the alleged abuse and neglect or the perpetrator of said abuse and neglect, results in making the problem untreatable and in making an improvement period an exercise in futility at the child's expense.

In re: Charity H., 215 W.Va. 208, 217, 599 S.E.2d 631, 640 (2004) (quoting W. Va. Dept. of Health and Human Res. v. Doris S., 197 W.Va. 489, 498, 475 S.E.2d 865, 874 (1996)). We have further explained that "an improvement period in the context of abuse and neglect proceedings is viewed as an opportunity for the miscreant parent to modify his/her behavior so as to correct the conditions of abuse and/or neglect with which he/she has been charged." In re Emily, 208 W.Va. 325, 334, 540 S.E.2d 540, 551. Under this precedent, in order to remedy the abuse and/or neglect problem, the parent must recognize and acknowledge that his or her conduct constituted abuse. As the circuit court aptly explained during the hearing on the motion for a post-adjudicatory improvement period, "you don't have to have intentional abuse in order to have abuse[,]" and that "being a[n] amenably acceptable parent is more than simply not repeating the same mistakes. It's understanding what it takes to keep them [the children] safe and to keep them healthy."[22]

In the case at bar, the parties appeared at the first adjudicatory hearing with the understanding that the mother would stipulate to the allegations of abuse and neglect, based upon a stipulation reached among the parties at an MDT meeting, after which the Department would recommend an improvement period. At this hearing, however, the mother refused to follow through with the stipulation. The record similarly reflects that the mother had declined a pre-adjudicatory improvement period because she did not believe that she had done anything inappropriate or anything to cause a need for improvement.

Thereafter, a contested adjudicatory hearing was held. Following the mother being adjudicated as an abusing parent, the circuit court held an evidentiary hearing solely on the mother's motion for a post-adjudicatory improvement period. During this hearing, the circuit court heard the testimony of several witnesses, including that of Dr. Miller, the mother's forensic evaluating psychiatrist. While the mother asserts that the circuit court did not give enough weight to the testimony of Dr. Miller, it is clear from the record Dr. Miller's testimony was fully considered by the circuit court. In fact, the circuit court appointed the mother additional legal counsel, which was one of the very accommodations suggested by Dr. Miller, in an effort to assist her in admitting her issues and making her amenable to the services being offered to her by the Department.

to put her past experiences with the Department behind her and to recognize that she had failed her children when they were with her.

Under West Virginia Code § 49-6-12(b)(2), the mother was required to prove "by clear and convincing evidence" that she was "likely to fully participate in the improvement period . . . ." Id. The mother failed to meet her burden. As the Department argues–and as the record reflects–the mother refused to acknowledge that she had abused her children by allowing Timber to get into a truck with Jack G. in hopes that he would sexually abuse her, again, so that it could be recorded with a cell phone. The mother further refused to acknowledge that she had abused her children by requiring both Timber and Reuben to live with this abuser for another four months after the abuse was disclosed. Indeed, the record reflects that instead of recognizing that her failure to protect her children was abuse, the mother persistently blamed others, including law enforcement and the Department.

Based upon the testimony and evidence received at this hearing on the mother's motion for an improvement period, the circuit court found, as discussed previously, that the mother had "failed to demonstrate, by clear and convincing evidence, that she is likely to fully participate in the improvement period[;]" that the mother had "yet to take responsibility for her actions or inactions and acknowledge that her failure to protect the children constituted abuse[;]" and that given the mother's failure to acknowledge the existence of any problem, "granting an improvement period would be futile . . . ."

Upon our review of the record and our prior case law, as discussed above, we find that the mother had a meaningful opportunity to seek an improvement period, but she failed to carry her evidentiary burden under West Virginia Code § 49-6-12(b)(2). Given that the grant of an improvement period is at the discretion of the circuit court,[23] this Court finds no error in the circuit court's denial of an improvement period under the facts and circumstances of this case.

C. Termination of parental rights

The mother argues that the circuit court committed error in terminating her parental rights because neither the circuit court nor the Department considered any alternatives less restrictive than termination. She further argues that because there was no finding of aggravated circumstances following adjudication, the Department was not relieved of its duty to work toward reunifying the family. Conversely, the Department argues that the circuit court correctly found that there was no less restrictive disposition than termination because the mother could not provide the children with the safety and security they need. The Department adds that the circuit court did consider a less restrictive alternative–i.e., an improvement period–and held an evidentiary hearing specifically to address the mother's motion for the same.[24]

[23]West Virginia Code § 49-6-2(b) provides, in relevant part, that "the court may grant any respondent an improvement period in accord with the provisions of this article." (Emphasis added).

We have previously observed that the "'"'[t]ermination of parental rights, the most drastic remedy under the statutory provision covering the disposition of neglected children, W.Va. Code, 49-6-5 [1977][,] may be employed without the use of intervening less restrictive alternatives when it is found that there is no reasonable likelihood under W.Va. Further, "'courts are not required to exhaust every speculative possibility of parental improvement . . . where it appears that the welfare of the child will be seriously threatened . . . .' Syl. Pt. 1, in part, In re R.J.M., 164 W.Va. 496, 266 S.E.2d 114 (1980)." Syl. Pt. 4, in part, In re Cecil T., 228 W.Va. 89, 717 S.E.2d 873. Moreover, under West [24]We also observe from the record that while the mother had initially sought a post-dispositional improvement period, she retreated from that position during the disposition hearing when her counsel advised the circuit court that it was "not [the mother's] intention today to ask for a dispositional improvement period . . . ." He later argued that "ideally, yes, she'd like the petition dismissed and she'd like her children returned to her . . . . Realistically, the plan we would suggest to the Court is somewhat similar to the department's permanency plan. The Court return the children to [Kevin M.]." Counsel then asked that the circuit court "simply terminate the physical custody rights and visitation rights, not an absolute termination of parental rights." The Department's counsel responded that permanency would not be achieved short of a full termination of parental rights.

Virginia Code § 49-6-5(a)(6), courts are directed to terminate an abusing parent's parental rights "[u]pon a finding that there is no reasonable likelihood that the conditions of neglect or abuse can be substantially corrected in the near future and, when necessary for the welfare of the child . . . ." Id.

In the case sub judice, the circuit court found in its disposition order that the mother "has failed to recognize that she failed to protect her children and that she does not have the capacity to recognize and remedy that failure in the near future." The circuit court further found that the Department had "made reasonable efforts, with the children's health and safety being the paramount concern, to preserve the family" and had made reasonable efforts "to prevent removal and to promote reunification . . . ." In addition, the circuit court found that "[t]here is no reasonable likelihood that the conditions of abuse can be substantially corrected in the near future and the children need continuity in care and caretakers, and a significant amount of time is required to be integrated into a stable and permanent home environment." The circuit court concluded that "[b]ased upon necessity for the welfare and best interests of the children . . . the parental rights of [the mother] are terminated."

Upon our review of the record, as discussed above, we find that the circuit court was presented with sufficient evidence upon which to base its findings that there was no reasonable likelihood to believe that conditions of abuse and neglect could be substantially corrected in the near future and that termination was necessary for the children's welfare. The record reflects that the mother, through her words, action and inaction, demonstrated an intractable unwillingness and inability to acknowledge her culpability in this matter, to accept the services offered by the Department, and to protect her children in the future. Accordingly, we find no clear error in the circuit court's termination of the mother's parental rights to Timber M. and Reuben M. under the facts and circumstances of this case.

D. Custody of the children

In the circuit court's dispositional order entered August 16, 2012, the circuit court granted both physical and legal custody of Timber M. and Reuben M. to their biological father, Kevin M. Based upon our review of the record, we find that placement to be extremely troubling, as explained below.

The record in this case indicates that between 2004 and 2011, during which the mother and Kevin M. were involved in a custody dispute concerning Timber M. and Reuben M., there were thirteen referrals to CPS involving these children, at least eight of which the mother instituted or caused to be instituted against Kevin M. These referrals contained allegations that Kevin M. sexually abused Timber M., beat one or both of the children, and allowed the children's head lice to go untreated. With regard to those specific allegations, the Department investigated and determined that they were "not substantiated."

In addition to the unsubstantiated allegations, the record does contain substantiated allegations of sexual abuse by Kevin M. The record contains a CPS social summary filed in the circuit court which indicates that Kevin M. had been accused of "sexual abuse on more than one occasion and with more than one victim[,]" and that when questioned about the matter, he "stated that every time he gets divorced or separated, someone accuses him of sexual abuse." One such instance involved a CPS referral in June of 2008 alleging that Kevin M. had been sexually abusing his then-stepdaughter, M.B., who was twelve years old at the time. The record reflects that these allegations, which involved Kevin M. fondling M.B.'s breasts and digitally penetrating her vagina two to three times a week, were substantiated. At the time, M.B. described Kevin M.'s digital penetration as being "so hard" that she felt that his finger "would come out her butt." The record further indicates that when Kevin M. was questioned concerning these allegations, "he did not recall" touching M.B.'s vagina and refused to take a polygraph examination. Subsequently, these allegations became the subject of an indictment returned against Kevin M. on February 2, 2010, charging him with two counts of third degree sexual assault, two counts of sexual abuse by a parent, guardian, custodian or person in a position of trust to a child, and two counts of incest, each count naming M.B. as his victim.[25] See State v. Kevin Dale M., Case No. 10-F-6.

This criminal proceeding against Kevin M. was referenced in the Department's abuse and neglect petition when the Department stated that it was considering the possibility of placing the children with their biological father, Kevin M., "upon further assessment of criminal charges" pending against him. On December 22, 2011, the same day the initial abuse and neglect petition was filed, the indictment against Kevin M. was dismissed on the motion of the prosecutor, who stated simply that "the State no longer wishes to prosecute."[26] In the Department's amended petition, also filed on December 22, 2011, the Department alleged that these criminal charges were dismissed "due to the victim not wishing the matter to proceed further, and due to certain other considerations of the Prosecuting Attorney's Office."[27] These same criminal charges were referenced by Kevin M.'s counsel during the hearing on the mother's motion for a post-adjudicatory improvement period when he implied that the criminal charges were dismissed against Kevin M. to pave the way for the children to be placed into his physical custody:

[25]The reason or reasons for the delay in the filing of these criminal charges following the CPS referral in 2008 are not set forth in the record.

[26]The only information from this criminal action in the record is a copy of the indictment against Kevin M. and the circuit court's order dismissing that criminal action.

[27]The record is silent as to what these "certain other considerations" might be.

> My client was first called to [the Department] when these children were picked up and told to come and get your children. Well, then somebody apparently looked at the allegations that had been made against him and said, no, wait a minute, we've got to get this off your record . . . . And the prosecutor granted a quick dismissal and we got an order to do that. Then he was told, no, you can't have the children unless you go with your parents.

Significantly, although the criminal charges were dismissed by the circuit court, there is absolutely no indication in the record that M.B. ever retracted her allegations against Kevin M.

In addition to the specific allegations against Kevin M., the Department's amended petition also alleged that Kevin M. was minimizing the mother's culpability in the abuse and neglect matter, despite having first-hand knowledge that the mother had left the children for more than four months with their stepfather, Jack G., after knowing that Jack G. was exposing himself to Timber and showing her pornographic materials.[28] In fact, during the eight-month period that the abuse and neglect proceedings against the mother were litigated, all of the social summary notes and case report notes in the record indicate that Kevin M. continued to minimize the mother's culpability and, therefore, he "would not [be expected to] play a protective role" with respect to the children. These same summaries and reports further indicate that Kevin M. did not want custody.[29]

[28]All of the information in the record indicates that after the mother and Kevin M. moved past the child custody proceedings following their separation, they became "quite friendly" and often went hunting together, including during the four-month period in which the mother allowed Jack G. to continue to live in the home.

Thereafter, the record is silent as to why the Department recommended that Kevin M. be granted custody of Timber and Reuben, particularly when the children were, by all accounts, doing well in a foster placement. Although there might be pertinent information in the children's permanency plan, that document is not in the record.[30] Finally, there is nothing in the circuit court's dispositional order to suggest when, and why, Kevin M. decided to accept custody, or when, and why, the Department decided that was a good idea. Regrettably, the Department's counsel was unable to assuage this Court's concerns when questioned about this placement during oral argument other than to suggest, as did the GAL, that this placement was the result of the Department's inability to "prove" the allegations [29]While Kevin M. did not want custody, he did want visitation. In the circuit court's order entered following the preliminary hearing, it referred Kevin M.'s request for visitation, and the decision as to whether such visitation should be supervised, to the MDT. Apparently Kevin M. was granted supervised visitation because the record contains a report of the MDT meeting held on August 8, 2012, which states, in part, that "[t]he team . . . decided to no longer have [Kevin M.] be supervised with his children [and] that he can take them out in his vehicle alone and do different activities without the supervision of his parents." However, this Court could not find any discussion in any of the MDT meeting reports in the record regarding the prior sexual abuse allegations against Kevin M., nor any explanation for the MDT's decision to allow Kevin M. to have supervised visitation, nor any explanation for the MDT's decision that the visitations no longer needed to be supervised.

[30]While Rules 39 through 46 of the Rules of Procedure for Child Abuse and Neglect Proceedings contemplate permanent placement reviews and the entry of additional orders following these reviews, if any of this has occurred, that information is also not in the record.

against Kevin M. in the context of the instant proceeding. Of course, there is also nothing in the record to indicate that anyone talked to either the prosecutor or the victim in State v. Kevin Dale M., or reviewed the discovery in that case, or otherwise made any attempt to ascertain the "certain other considerations" that led to the case being dismissed two years after it was instituted, other than the aforementioned statements made by Kevin M.'s counsel.

While the custodial placement for the children is not an issue raised in this appeal, this Court cannot ignore the alarming information in the record concerning Kevin M. As indicated above, this Court is unable to glean from either the record or the circuit court's dispositional order why the children's placement with the biological father was deemed appropriate in light of the information in the record concerning the father. As we have previously stated, "[w]ithout factual or legal findings, this Court is greatly at sea without a chart or compass in making a determination as to whether the circuit court's decision was right or wrong." Brown ex rel. Brown v. Genesis Healthcare Corp., 228 W.Va. 646, 689, 724 S.E.2d 250, 293 (2011) (internal citations omitted). This is the position in which this Court now finds itself.

Although our general rule is that issues not raised on appeal will not be considered, Rule 2 of the West Virginia Rules of Appellate Procedure specifically provides, as follows:

> In the interest of expediting decision, or for other good cause shown, the Supreme Court may suspend the requirements or provisions of any of these Rules in a particular case on application of a party or on its own motion and may order proceedings in accordance with its direction. These Rules shall be construed to allow the Supreme Court to do substantial justice.

With similar considerations, Rule 2 of the Rules of Procedure for Child Abuse and Neglect Proceedings provides, in pertinent part, that "[t]hese rules shall be liberally construed to achieve safe, stable, secure permanent homes for abused and/or neglected children[,]" and further provides that "[t]hese rules are not to be applied or enforced in any manner which will endanger or harm a child."

Thus, it is clear from our procedural rules, as well as our prior case law, that "[t]here cannot be too much advocacy for children." State ex rel. Diva P. v. Kaufman, 200 W.Va. 555, 570, 490 S.E.2d 642, 657 (1997) (Workman, C.J., concurring). Indeed, if one thing is firmly fixed in our jurisprudence involving abused and neglected children, it is that the "polar star test [is] looking to the best interests of our children and their right to healthy, happy productive lives[.]" In re Edward B., 210 W.Va. 621, 632, 558 S.E.2d 620, 631 (2001). This Court has repeatedly stated that a child's welfare acts as "the polar star by which the discretion of the court will be guided." In Re: Clifford K., 217 W.Va. 625, 634, 619 S.E.2d 138, 147 (2005) (internal citation omitted). See also In re D.P., 230 W.Va. 254, __737 S.E.2d 282, 285 (2012) ("It is axiomatic that, in any contest involving the care and custody of a minor, 'the welfare of the child is the polar star by which the discretion of the court will be guided.' Syllabus Point 2, State ex rel. Lipscomb v. Joplin, 131 W.Va. 302, 47 S.E.2d 221 (1948).").

With these guiding principles in mind, this Court has previously addressed matters not raised in the appeal of cases involving the welfare of children. See In re Jonathan Michael D., 194 W.Va. 20, 27, 459 S.E.2d 131, 138 (1995) ("On the issue of the improvement period, we sua sponte address an issue of particular concern to this Court."); In re Jamie Nicole H., 205 W.Va. 176, 183, 517 S.E.2d 41, 48 (1999) ("While Appellant has not raised the sufficiency of the trial court's dispositional order, we address this issue sua sponte."). Cf. In re K.R., 229 W.Va. 733, __ n. 23, 735 S.E.2d 882, 893 n. 23 (2012) ("While neither party assigned this specific ruling as error, this does not affect this Court's ability to determine it to be error: '[I]t is within the authority of this Court to "sua sponte, in the interest of justice, notice plain error." Cartwright v. McComas, 223 W.Va. 161, 164, 672 S.E.2d 297, 300 (2008) (quoting Syl. Pt. 1, in part, State v. Myers, 204 W.Va. 449, 513

S.E.2d 676 (1998).”));[31] Ringer v. John, No. 11-1325 (W.Va. April 2, 2013) (Court deciding case on the basis of an issue not raised by the parties).[32]

Based on our prior precedent and firmly rooted in this Court’s concern for the well-being of children, we now hold that in cases involving the abuse and neglect of children, when it appears from this Court’s review of the record on appeal that the health and welfare of a child may be at risk as a result of the child’s custodial placement, regardless of whether that placement is an issue raised in the appeal, this Court will take such action as it deems appropriate and necessary to protect that child. Such action may include vacating the circuit court’s order of disposition with respect to the custodial placement, remanding the case for further proceedings, and directing the entry of an order fully explaining the propriety of the custodial placement. The thoroughness of such an order becomes extremely important if a circuit court were to determine on remand that its initial custodial placement was, in fact, appropriate.

[31]Similarly, Rule 10(c)(3) of the West Virginia Rules of Appellate Procedure provides, in relevant part, that “[i]n its discretion, this Court may consider a plain error not among the assignments of error but evident from the record and otherwise within its jurisdiction to decide.”

[32]See also 5 Am. Jur. 2d Appellate Review § 762 (recognizing the power of appellate courts to remand cases for further proceedings “where justice demands that course in order that some defect in the record may be supplied; such a remand may be made to permit further evidence to be taken or additional findings to be made upon essential points. (Internal citation omitted).”).

In reviewing the record submitted by the parties in the case at bar, there is a glaring evidentiary gap that leaves this Court with the firm conviction that no one in the proceedings below adequately considered the issue of Kevin M.'s fitness to have custody of Timber M. and Reuben M.[33] Cf. Syl. Pt. 1, in part, In Interest of Tiffany Marie S., 196 W.Va. 223, 470 S.E.2d 177 (1996) ("A finding is clearly erroneous when, although there is evidence to support the finding, the reviewing court on the entire evidence is left with the definite and firm conviction that a mistake has been committed."). Accordingly, we remand this case to the circuit court for further proceedings to determine whether permanent custodial placement of the children with Kevin M. is appropriate and for the entry of an order that fully explains the propriety of the custodial placement.

IV. Conclusion

Based upon this Court's thorough review of this matter and for the foregoing reasons, the order of the Circuit Court of Greenbrier County entered on August 16, 2012, is affirmed with regard to the termination of the petitioner's parental rights to her children, Timber M. and Reuben M., but vacated with regard to custodial placement. This case is remanded for further proceedings to determine whether permanent custodial placement of [33]While there are various comments in the record as to the Department's services being in place to assist the father, Kevin M., those services appear to be directed to the father's reluctance and concern in assuming full-time responsibility for his children, as opposed to services related to his history of sexual abuse allegations involving children.

SUPREME COURT OF APPEALS

Workman, Justice, concurring:

I concur in the Court's disposition of all issues relating to Norma G., the children's mother, who has demonstrated both by her words and her actions that she is unwilling and unable to acknowledge her culpability in this matter, unwilling and unable to accept services from DHHR,[1] and unwilling and unable to protect the children in the future. I write separately to express my wholehearted support of the Court's adoption of syllabus point six, which is consistent with our precedents but is now expressly adjudicated and "prefixed to the published report of the case" as set forth in Article Eight, Section 4 of the West Virginia Constitution. Justice Loughry, writing for the majority, has done a great service for the children of West Virginia by clarifying that it is always a court's duty to protect children who are before the court.

As painstakingly detailed in the Court's opinion, the record in this case indicates that

[1]Given the finite resources available to state agencies to fulfill their mission of assisting families in crisis, the suggestion that Norma G. should be provided a law-trained mediator to cajole her into accepting services from DHHR, or that agency workers from another county should be pulled into her case because she doesn't "like" or "trust" the workers in Greenbrier County, is frankly absurd. Norma G. was afforded a full panoply of procedural rights throughout these proceedings, and was further offered an array of services that might have enabled her to achieve the goal of unification with her children. She declined to accept the services because she deemed them unnecessary.

Kevin M. has been accused on multiple occasions of sexually-based offenses against minor children. Giving him the benefit of the doubt, as DHHR investigators did at the time, it may be inferred from the record that at least some of the charges, filed by Norma G. during the pendency of the couple's custody dispute, may have been bogus.[2] Others, according to Norma G.'s testimony in these proceedings, although instituted by her against Kevin M. involved incidents that she now believes to have been perpetrated by unnamed "others" in Kevin's household.[3]

Even putting aside the charges filed by Norma G. against Kevin M., the record in this case contains alarming information about other charges against Kevin G. that cannot be readily dismissed as bogus or otherwise groundless. As detailed in the Court's opinion, in February 2, 2010, Kevin M. was indicted by a grand jury on multiple charges of sexual assault and intrusion involving his then-stepdaughter, M.B., who was twelve years old at the time. State v. Kevin Dale M., Case No. 10-F-6. On December 22, 2011, the indictment was dismissed on motion of the prosecutor, who stated the following as grounds for his action:

[2]During the pendency of the parties' custody proceedings, and as part of what CPS termed an "ongoing custody battle," Norma G. instituted or caused to be instituted twelve investigations into allegations that Kevin M. sexually abused Timber M., beat one or both of the children, and allowed the children's head lice to go untreated. In each instance, DHHR investigated and determined that the allegations made against Kevin M. were "not substantiated."

[3]This, of course, begs the question of what Kevin M. was doing while the unnamed others in his household were sexually abusing his children.

"because the State no longer wishes to prosecute." On that same date, DHHR filed a petition, and then an amended petition, for temporary custody of Timber M. and Reuben M. In the original petition, DHHR sought temporary placement of the children with their paternal uncle, indicating that it was looking at placement with Kevin M. "upon further assessment of criminal charges." In the amended petition, DHHR clarified that the charges against Kevin M. had been dismissed due to "the victim not wishing the matter to proceed further, and due to certain other considerations of the Prosecuting Attorney's office."[4] In the amended petition, DHHR also alleged that Kevin G. was minimizing Norma G.'s culpability in the abuse and neglect matter, despite having first-hand knowledge that Norma G. had left the children with their stepfather, Jack G., after knowing that Jack G. was exposing himself to Timber M. and showing her pornographic materials.[5]

During the eight-month period in which the abuse and neglect proceedings against Norma G. were litigated, all of the social summary notes and case report notes indicate that Kevin M. continued to minimize Norma G.'s culpability and therefore "would not [be expected to] play a protective role" with respect to the children. Additionally, the notes indicate that although Kevin M. wanted visitation, and was amenable to services, he did not want custody. Finally, and most significantly, the notes indicate that although the criminal charges against Kevin M. had been dismissed because the victim, M.B., did not want to proceed with the case, M.B. had never recanted her allegations against Kevin M.

[4]The record is silent as to what these "certain other considerations" might be.

[5]All of the information in the appendix record indicates that after the conclusion of the custody proceedings between Norma G. and Kevin M., the two became "quite friendly" and often went hunting together – including hunting trips taken during the four-month period in which Norma G. allowed Jack G. to continue living with her and the children.

Thereafter, the appendix record is completely silent with respect to a key question: why, with the children by all accounts doing well in a foster placement, did the DHHR reverse course and recommend that Kevin M. be given custody of Timber M. and Reuben M.? As noted in the majority opinion, the appendix record submitted to this Court contains no information indicating that anyone talked to either the prosecuting attorney or the victim in State v. Kevin Dale M., or reviewed the discovery in that case, or otherwise made any attempt to ascertain the "certain other considerations" that led to the case being dismissed two years after it was instituted. See text supra. Further, although there might be information in the Case Plan on this critical issue – one would hope, given the requirements of the law that a multidisciplinary treatment team consider every aspect of a case[6] – that document is, again, not contained in the appendix record. Finally, nothing in the circuit court's disposition order of August 14, 2012, gives any hint as to when, why, or on what basis the court became "comfortable" with the decision to give Kevin M. custody of the children.[7]

Although none of the parties to this case raised the issue of placement, this Court has both the right and the duty to address it. As the Court's opinion notes, both Rule 2 of the West Virginia Rules of Appellate Procedure and Rule 2 of the West Virginia Rules of Procedure for Child Abuse and Neglect Proceedings codify the Court's authority to suspend rules, and/or to liberally construe them, the former rule for the general purpose of "do[ing] substantial justice" and the latter rule for the specific purpose of "achiev[ing] safe, stable, secure permanent homes for abused and/or neglected children[.]" And as the Court's opinion also notes, we have not hesitated in the past to address issues sua sponte in cases involving the welfare of children. See In re K.R., 229 W. Va. 733, __ n.23, 735 S.E.2d 882, 893 n.23 (2012) "[I]t is within the authority of this Court to 'sua sponte, in the interest of justice, notice plain error.'" (Internal citations omitted.)

I cannot conceive of a case more appropriate for the exercise of our authority to notice plain error "in the interest of justice" than one in which children may in danger as a result of an inappropriate placement. We have consistently held that in matters involving abused and neglected children, the "polar star test [is] looking to the best interests of our children and their right to healthy, happy productive lives[.]" In re Edward B., 210 W. Va. 621, 632, 558 S.E.2d 620, 631 (2001); see Michael K.T. v. Tina L.T., 182 W. Va. 399, 405, 387 S.E.2d 866, 872 (1989) ("[T]he best interests of the child is the polar star by which decisions must be made which affect children."); In re George Glen B. Jr., 207 W. Va. 346, 355, 532 S.E.2d 64, 73 (2000) ("[W]hen a petition alleging abuse and neglect has been filed, a circuit court has a duty to safeguard the child and provide for his or her best interests."). In reviewing the record submitted to this Court, which contains a significant evidentiary gap, four members of this Court are left with the definite and firm conviction that no one in the proceedings below adequately developed the issue of Kevin M.'s fitness to have custody of Timber M. and Reuben M. Cf. Syl. Pt. 1, in part, In re Tiffany Marie S., 196 W. Va. 223, 470 S.E.2d 177 (1996) ("A finding is clearly erroneous when, although there is evidence to support the finding, the reviewing court on the entire evidence is left with the definite and firm conviction that a mistake has been committed."). The dissenting justice, although expressing reservations as to the Court's adoption of syllabus point six, concurs in the Court's decision to vacate and remand for further proceedings on the custody issue.

[7]At oral argument, it was suggested by counsel for DHHR that because the agency couldn't "prove" the charges against Kevin M., that was the end of the matter. Again, with no indication that anyone in this case has ever spoken to M.B., spoken to the prosecuting attorney, or reviewed the discovery in the criminal case, this excuse rings hollow.

The dissenting justice takes issue with the Court's recitation of the facts about accusations made against Kevin M. when Kevin M. is not a party to this appeal and "did not have the opportunity to address the majority's concerns[.]" This begs the question: why was Kevin M. dismissed from the proceedings below?[8] It further assumes that this Court has adjudicated Kevin M.'s rights, which is not the case; we have vacated and remanded for further proceedings. If the circuit court is correct that Kevin M. is a fit and proper custodian for Timber and Reuben, then the remand proceedings will allow the parties to make a record, and the court to make specific findings, to support the court's conclusion.

Additionally, the dissenting justice expresses concern that syllabus point six of the Court's opinion is overly broad and "serves as an invitation to this Court to disregard long-settled standards of review." In my view, this concern is unfounded. First, our rules not only permit but in fact require that in abuse and neglect appeals, "[w]ithin one week of any oral argument . . . the parties shall provide a written statement of any change in the circumstances that were set forth in the briefs." W. Va. R. App. P. 11(j).[9] Second, it is well established in our jurisprudence that in cases involving the welfare of children, we may "sua sponte address

[8]Consistent with the complete "information gap"in the record of these proceedings with respect to Kevin M., information in the file indicates that he was dismissed from the case prior to the final hearing but there is no circuit court order to that effect.

[9]Indeed, in an Administrative Order entered on December 10, 2012, Re: Filings That Do Not Comply With the Rules of Appellate Procedure, then-Chief Justice Ketchum specifically noted in paragraph 12 that "[b]riefs by all parties in abuse and neglect cases that do not set forth the information about the current status of the child that is required by Rule 11(j)" are not in compliance with this Court's rules.

an issue of particular concern to this Court."[10] Third, the issue of Kevin M.'s fitness fairly leaps off the face of the record in this case; whether or not the issue was raised by the parties, it permeates these proceedings.[11] For these reasons, I am unwilling to accept the proposition that because of a speculative concern about what could happen in some other case at some other time, this Court should passively accept the distinct possibility of harm to the children in this case. Timber M. and Reuben M. deserve more, and this Court's adoption of syllabus point six makes it clear that the interests of children are, and will always be, the "polar star" in abuse and neglect proceedings.

Accordingly, I concur in the Court's judgment.

[10]In re Jonathan Michael D., 194 W. Va. 20, 27, 459 S.E.2d 131, 138 (1995). The Court's opinion cites Jonathan Michael D. and a number of other cases standing for this proposition.

[11]In this regard, this case is completely different from Mowery v. Hitt, 155 W. Va. 103, 181 S.E.2d 334 (1971), Shackleford v. Catlett, 161 W. Va. 568, 244 S.E.2d 327 (1978), and Voelker v. Frederick Business Properties Co., 195 W. Va. 246, 465 S.E.2d 246 (1995), all of which held, in syllabus points one, one and three, respectively, that "[i]n the exercise of its appellate jurisdiction, this Court will not decide nonjurisdictional questions which were not considered and decided by the court from which the appeal has been taken." This statement describes the Court's general practice, not the ambit of the Court's constitutional authority. Indeed, nothing in the text of these cases suggests, let alone compels, the conclusion that this Court is prohibited from noticing plain error, or raising an issue sua sponte, in the interest of justice. The dissenting justice concedes as much. And as noted earlier, this Court is not deciding the issue of Kevin M.'s fitness to have custody of the children; rather, we are requiring the parties to make a record sufficient to permit the circuit court to make findings of fact and conclusions of law in the first instance.

Benjamin, Chief Justice, concurring, in part, and dissenting, in part:

I concur with the majority's decision to affirm the circuit court's termination of the mother's parental rights to Timber M. and Reuben M. Also, I agree with the majority's decision to vacate the order that placed the children in the custody of Kevin M. and to remand for further proceedings on the custody issue. However, I dissent to the majority's adoption of new syllabus point 6, because I believe that the majority could have addressed the concerns regarding Kevin M. without formulating a new, overly-broad syllabus point.

As made clear in the majority opinion, there is ample authority supporting this Court's power to consider sua sponte issues not raised by the parties on appeal if it is necessary to do so in the interests of justice. The interests of justice certainly include the welfare of children. Therefore, the majority could have relied upon existing precedent to vacate the custody order and remand for further proceedings.

In addition, new syllabus point 6 is overly broad and, as such, is ripe for abuse. According to the syllabus point, in order to protect the health and welfare of a child in a custody case "the Court will take such action as it deems appropriate and necessary to protect the child." However, any action taken by this Court to protect a child is subject to a parent's constitutional rights and principles of due process which is not made clear in the syllabus point. Moreover, I am concerned that the broad language in the syllabus point serves as an invitation to this Court to disregard long-settled standards of review and to reverse a circuit court's decision in an abuse and neglect case simply because the Court would have decided the case differently.

The majority's decision with regard to Kevin M.'s custody of the children is a troubling example of the operation of the new syllabus point. The majority's decision greatly affects Kevin M., yet he is not a party to this appeal and he did not have the opportunity to address the majority's concerns regarding the custody issue. Further, the majority makes a significant finding regarding Kevin M.'s former conduct based on a cold and apparently incomplete record and absent Kevin M.'s participation as a party before the Court.

In sum, it would have been preferable for the majority to craft a more modest syllabus point that better reflects constitutional limitations on the Court's authority or simply to rely on existing precedent in addressing the issue of Kevin M.'s custody of the children.

For the reasons stated above, I concur with the majority's disposition of this case, but I dissent to the majority's adoption of new syllabus point 6.

SYLLABUS BY THE COURT

1. "Although parents have substantial rights that must be protected, the primary goal in cases involving abuse and neglect, as in all family law matters, must be the health and welfare of the children." Syllabus Point 3, In re Katie S., 198 W.Va. 79, 479 S.E.2d 589 (1996).

2. "Although conclusions of law reached by a circuit court are subject to de novo review, when an action, such as an abuse and neglect case, is tried upon the facts without a jury, the circuit court shall make a determination based upon the evidence and shall make findings of fact and conclusions of law as to whether such child is abused or neglected. These findings shall not be set aside by a reviewing court unless clearly erroneous. A finding is clearly erroneous when, although there is evidence to support the finding, the reviewing court on the entire evidence is left with the definite and firm conviction that a mistake has been committed. However, a reviewing court may not overturn a finding simply because it would have decided the case differently, and it must affirm a finding if the circuit court's account of the evidence is plausible in light of the record viewed in its entirety." Per Curiam:

This appeal arises from an August 29, 2001 order of the Circuit Court of Lewis County, West Virginia terminating the parental rights of the appellant, Dorlen M., as to his daughter, Tonjia M.[1] The appellant asserts that the circuit court erred in four ways: first, by finding that Tonjia was an abused and neglected child; second, by denying the appellant's motion for an improvement period; third, by denying the appellant's request for supervised visitations with his daughter during the pendency of the case; and finally, by admitting into evidence photographs from a roll of undeveloped film found in the appellant's home.

I.

On May 5, 2000, a West Virginia Department of Health and Human Resources ("DHHR") Child Protective Services Worker, Jennifer Jonas Linger, filed a petition in Lewis County Circuit Court alleging that five-year-old Tonjia M. was an "abused and neglected child" as defined by W.Va. Code, 49-1-3 [1999].[2]

---

[1]Because of the sensitive nature of this case, initials will be used to protect the names of the parties involved.

[2]W.Va. Code, 49-1-3(a) [1999] defines an "abused child" as:

> a child whose health or welfare is harmed or threatened by:
>
> (1) A parent, guardian or custodian who knowingly or intentionally inflicts, attempts to inflict or knowingly allows another person to inflict, physical injury or mental or emotional injury, upon the child or another child in the home; or
> (2) Sexual abuse or sexual exploitation[.]

Specifically, the petition alleged that Tonjia's father, Dorlen M., had exposed Tonjia to sexually explicit adult movies, that he had struck her with his hand and with a switch, that he had touched and kissed her buttocks and genitalia, that Tonjia was afraid to return home to her father, and that Tonjia had gone to school dirty. The petition alleged other similar instances of neglect, unfitness, and improper parental care by Dorlen M. and by Tonya D., Tonjia's mother.

The circuit court determined that there was reasonable cause to believe that Tonjia' physical well-being was in imminent danger, placed Tonjia in the temporary custody of the DHHR pending further proceedings, and set the matter for preliminary hearing. The circuit court then appointed for Tonjia a guardian ad litem. Because Dorlen M. and Tonya D. were indigent, they were each appointed counsel.[3]

On May 11, 2000, Dorlen M. requested, and the circuit court granted, supervised visitation with Tonjia. The father had his first supervised visit with his daughter in late May 2000. Ms. Linger from the DHHR supervised the visit. On June 5, 2000, a hearing was held and Ms. Linger testified about Dorlen M.'s behavior during the supervised visit. Ms. Linger testified that Dorlen M. had acted inappropriately by repeatedly kissing his daughter "passionately" on the lips for a lengthy periods of time and that when the petitioner attempted to hold Tonjia, she would try to squirm away. Ms. Linger also testified that Tonjia's grandmother, who was also present during the visit, told Tonjia to "to stop telling stories, to stop lying" and that "she was getting him [her father] in trouble." According to Tonjia's foster parent, Tonjia was greatly upset by the visit with her father and grandmother. Ms. Linger further testified that Tonjia's psychologist had recommended cancelling visitation between Tonjia and her father and grandmother because of the effect it had on Tonjia. At the end of the hearing, the circuit court terminated Dorlen M.'s supervised visitation with Tonjia.[4]

On June 30, 2000, the circuit court reconvened the adjudicatory hearing, but then continued it because of the appellant's absence. However, at the hearing, Dorlen M.'s counsel sought permission to withdraw from representing Dorlen M. because of a conflict of interest.[5] The circuit court judge granted the request to withdraw, appointed Dorlen M. new counsel, and rescheduled the adjudicatory hearing.

The adjudicatory hearing was held over the course of three subsequent dates: December 4, 2000, May 7, 2001, and June 27, 2001. On December 4, 2000, Lewis County Deputy John J. Burkhart testified and described the condition of Dorlen M.'s home at the time that Tonjia was removed from the home. Deputy Burkhart testified that the home was dirty and cluttered, and that, pursuant to a search warrant, he removed numerous adult magazines and magazine pages from Dorlen M.'s bedroom, plus four pornographic videotapes stacked next to the television in the living room. The pornographic tapes were found mixed with Tonjia's

[4]Despite Dorlen M.'s continued requests to reinstate supervised visits with his daughter, Dorlen M. was not permitted to visit his daughter again. Dorlen M.'s last contact with his daughter was in May of 2000 when she was five years old.

[5]Dorlen M.'s counsel, a mental hygiene commissioner, withdrew after an application for the commitment of Dorlen M. to a mental health institution was filed.

cartoon and video cassettes. Deputy Burkhart also testified that he seized an undeveloped roll of film from Dorlen M.'s residence. The Lewis County Sheriff's Department later developed the film and found it contained sexually explicit photographs of Tonjia's mother.

Dorlen M.'s counsel objected to admission of the developed pictures into evidence, arguing that the Sheriff's Department did not include the film on its inventory of the search warrant, and that Tonjia could not be exposed to the contents of an undeveloped roll of film. Although the judge initially declined to admit the pictures into evidence, ultimately the pictures were admitted over Dorlen M.'s counsel's objections.

Also at the December 2000 adjudicatory hearing, two mental health experts testified about whether Tonjia had been sexually abused or otherwise neglected. Margaret Tordella, a licensed clinical social worker and counselor, testified that she believed that Tonjia had been sexually abused and recommended no further contact between Tonjia and her father. Based on her ten interviews with Tonjia, Ms. Tordella testified that Dorlen M. had licked Tonjia's genitalia and buttocks, that Dorlen M. had sexual intercourse with his daughter five times, and had touched her between her legs. However, Ms. Tordella admitted that there were problems in consistency with the stories that Tonjia told, and that she had obtained information from Tonjia that some sexually inappropriate activity had occurred between Tonjia and another young boy in a foster home in which Tonjia was residing.

Next, Terry Laurita, a licensed psychologist, testified for Dorlen M. as a rebuttal to the testimony of Ms. Tordella. Ms. Laurita testified that there were numerous problems with Ms. Tordella's methodology, and that the evidence suggested that Tonjia could not tell the difference between the truth and fantasy. Notably, Ms. Laurita did not interview Tonjia. Additionally, Ms. Laurita could not conclude from the information presented whether or not Dorlen M. molested his daughter.

At the conclusion of testimony by the two experts, the circuit court, on its own motion, recessed the adjudicatory hearing to allow an independent evaluation by a third evaluator, child psychologist Chanin Kennedy. On May 7, 2001, Ms. Kennedy testified that she could neither affirm nor disprove whether Tonjia had been sexually abused by her father, but Ms. Kennedy concurred with the other evaluators in finding that Tonjia exhibited sexual behaviors inconsistent with children of her own age group.

At the conclusion of the adjudicatory hearing held on June 27, 2001, the circuit court found that Tonjia was the victim of sexual abuse by her father, and that she was as a matter of law an abused and neglected child. The circuit court also found that there was no substantial likelihood that the circumstances of neglect or abuse could be corrected.

The circuit court held a dispositional hearing on August 28, 2001. At the hearing, the circuit court denied Dorlen M.'s request for a post-adjudicatory improvement period and terminated his parental rights.

Dorlen M. asserts the following assignments of error: (1) that the circuit court erred in concluding that Dorlen M. sexually abused his daughter in light of the challenged expert witness testimony; (2) that the circuit court erred in denying Dorlen M.'s motion for a six-month out-of-home post-adjudicatory improvement period; (3) that the circuit court erred in denying Dorlen M.'s supervised visitation with Tonjia during the fifteen months the case was pending before the circuit court; and (4) that the circuit court erred in permitting the admission of sexually explicit photographs into evidence.

II.

Child abuse and neglect cases involve a delicate balancing between the interests of the parents and the rights of an innocent child. However, the law's overriding consideration is the best interest of the child or children involved. This Court has held that:

Syllabus Point 3, In re Katie S., 198 W.Va. 79, 479 S.E.2d 589 (1996).

In abuse and neglect cases, we review the circuit court's findings under a clearly erroneous standard.

> Although conclusions of law reached by a circuit court are subject to de novo review, when an action, such as an abuse and neglect case, is tried upon the facts without a jury, the circuit court shall make a determination based upon the evidence and shall make findings of fact and conclusions of law as to whether such child is abused or neglected. These findings shall not be set aside by a reviewing court unless clearly erroneous. A finding is clearly erroneous when, although there is evidence to support the finding, the reviewing court on the entire evidence is left with the definite and firm conviction that a mistake has been committed. However, a reviewing court may not overturn a finding simply because it would have decided the case differently, and it must affirm a finding if the circuit court's account of the evidence is plausible in light of the record viewed in its entirety.

Syllabus Point 1, In Interest Tiffany Marie S., 196 W.Va. 223, 470 S.E.2d 177 (1996).

Because of the serious consequences of abuse and neglect proceedings, certain safeguards have been statutorily installed. Under W.Va. Code, 49-6-2(c) [1996],[6] circuit courts must follow specific procedures when considering allegations of neglect or abuse; circuit courts must make specific findings, and those findings must be supported by clear and convincing evidence.

Pursuant to W.Va. Code, 49-6-5(a)(6) [1998],[7] a circuit court judge may permanently terminate parental rights only after finding that there in no reasonable likelihood > upon a finding that there is no reasonable likelihood that the conditions of neglect or abuse can be substantially corrected in the near future and, when necessary for the welfare of the child, terminate the parental, custodial or guardianship rights and/or responsibilities of the abusing parent and commit the child . . . to either the permanent guardianship of the department or a licensed child welfare agency.

[6]W.Va. Code, 49-6-2(c) [1996] states:

> In any proceeding pursuant to the provisions of this article, the party or parties having custodial or other parental rights or responsibilities to the child shall be afforded a meaningful opportunity to be heard, including the opportunity to testify and to present and cross-examine witnesses. The petition shall not be taken as confessed. A transcript or recording shall be made of all proceedings unless waived by all parties to the proceeding. The rules of evidence shall apply. Where relevant, the court shall consider the efforts of the state department to remedy the alleged circumstances. At the conclusion of the hearing the court shall make a determination based upon the evidence and shall make findings of fact and conclusions of law as to whether such child is abused or neglected, which shall be incorporated into the order of the court. The findings must be based upon conditions existing at the time of the filing of the petition and proven by clear and convincing proof.

[7]W.Va. Code, 49-6-5(a)(6) [1998] states in pertinent part:

that the conditions of abuse can be substantially corrected.[8] With this standard in mind, this Court will now address whether the circuit court erred in terminating the parental rights of the petitioner.

Dorlen M. argues that the circuit court's finding that he sexually abused Tonjia is not well-founded or plausible because of the numerous errors contained in social worker Margaret Tordella's evaluation and substantial evidence showing that five-year-old Tonjia is not a credible and accurate reporter.

Three different evaluators testified as to their findings about Tonjia. Margaret Tordella, who was Tonjia's counselor and had at least ten sessions with Tonjia, testified that Tonjia was sexually molested by her father. Ms. Tordella, who spent the most time with Tonjia, was quite clear that Tonjia had been abused and subjected to other inappropriate sexual conduct. Terry Laurita, who never actually interviewed Tonjia, stated that she could neither confirm nor deny that Tonjia had been the victim of sexual abuse at the hands of her father. Finally, Chanin Kennedy said that she could not rule out sexual abuse by Dorlen M. and that she was concerned about Tonjia's obvious exposure to sexual information. All of the experts agreed that Tonjia had a level of sexual knowledge far beyond that appropriate for five-year-olds.

[8]Under W.Va. Code, 49-6-5(b) [1998], "no reasonable likelihood that conditions of neglect or abuse can be substantially corrected"

> . . . mean[s] that, based upon the evidence before the court, the abusing adult or adults have demonstrated an inadequate capacity to solve the problems of abuse or neglect on their own or with help.

We conclude, based on the testimony of the three expert witnesses, the lay testimony, and other evidence submitted but not challenged by the appellant in this appeal, that the circuit court's finding that Dorlen M. abused and neglected Tonjia was not clearly erroneous.

The second issue that we address is whether the circuit court erred in denying Dorlen M. supervised visits with Tonjia during the fifteen months the case was pending before the circuit court. The law generally permits and supports visitation during the pendency of neglect or abuse hearings to allow the bonds of parent and child to remain intact in the absence of compelling evidence that visitation is not in the best interest of the child. In the instant case, the evidence of Dorlen M.'s inappropriate behavior, and of the grandmother attempting to "coach" Tonjia to recant her claims of sexual abuse supported the judge's decision to cancel visitation.

Dorlen M. next asserts that he satisfied the statutory requirements necessary for a post-adjudicatory improvement period. The language of W.Va. Code, 49-6-12(c) [1996][9] provides for a post-adjudicatory improvement period. However, there are limits to the granting

[9]W.Va. Code, 49-6-12(c) [1996] states, in pertinent part, that:

> (c) The court may grant an improvement period not to exceed six months as a disposition pursuant to section five of this article when:
> (1) The respondent moves in writing for the improvement period;
> (2) The respondent demonstrates, by clear and convincing evidence, that the respondent is likely to fully participate in the improvement period and the court further makes a finding, on the record, of the terms of the improvement period[.]

of a post-adjudicatory improvement period. See Syllabus Point 2, State ex rel. West Virginia Dept. of Human Services v. Cheryl M., 177 W.Va. 688, 356 S.E.2d 181 (1987) (holding that a parent may move for and be granted an improvement period "unless the court finds compelling circumstances to justify a denial").

The circuit court has the discretion to refuse to grant an improvement period when no improvement is likely. In West Virginia Department of Health and Human Resources ex rel. Wright v. Doris S., 197 W.Va. 489, 475 S.E.2d. 865 (1996), this Court addressed a similar situation stating that:

> . . . in order to remedy the abuse and/or neglect problem, the problem must first be acknowledged. Failure to acknowledge the existence of the problem, i.e., the truth of the basic allegation pertaining to the alleged abuse and neglect or the perpetrator of said abuse and neglect, results in making the problem untreatable and in making an improvement period an exercise in futility at the child's expense.

197 W.Va. at 498, 475 S.E.2d. at 874.

At issue is whether a compelling reason existed to deny the petitioner an improvement period. The circuit court judge, in making his ruling, stated that he was not concerned with the petitioner's ability to clean his home or to provide a proper room for Tonjia. The circuit court expressed his concern by stating that "[w]hat concerns the Court, from the initial proceedings in this case, is . . . that Mr. [M.] continues to deny that he did sexually abuse or sexually molest his daughter. . . . I don't believe that counseling without an admission can be effective."

We have held that the granting of an improvement period is within the circuit court's discretion. Given the facts of this case, this Court cannot find that the circuit court abused its discretion in denying a post-adjudicatory improvement period.

Finally, given the overwhelming weight of the other evidence in support of terminating Dorlen M.'s parental rights, we will briefly address whether the circuit court erred in permitting the admission of sexually explicit photographs into evidence when the Lewis County Sheriff's Department did not document on the search warrant receipt the roll of film from which the pictures came, and when Tonjia was unable to view the photographs on the undeveloped roll of film. Given the weight of evidence against Dorlen. M. and because there was no jury involved, any error that might have occurred in admitting the photographs into evidence was rendered harmless.

III.

Looking at the evidence in its entirety, we conclude that the circuit court judge did not abuse his discretion in denying visitation during the pendency of the abuse hearing. The circuit court properly found Tonjia to be an abused child, and that finding of abuse was supported by clear and convincing evidence. The circuit court did not abuse his discretion in denying a post-adjudicatory improvement period. Further, the circuit court's finding that there was no reasonable likelihood that the conditions of neglect or abuse would be substantially corrected in the near future was not clearly erroneous. Likewise, the circuit court's subsequent termination of Dorlen M.'s parental rights was supported by clear and convincing evidence and was not clearly erroneous. Finally, we find that the circuit court acted in the best interest of Tonjia throughout the underlying proceedings.

For all of the above reasons, we affirm the factual findings of the lower court.

Affirmed.

Guardian Ad Litem

The Opinion of the Court was delivered PER CURIAM.

Per Curiam:

This action is before this Court on two separate appeals. The Department of Health and Human Resources ("DHHR") and Charlotte C. See footnote 1 jointly appeal a November 16, 1998, order of the Circuit Court of Preston County. The DHHR and

Charlotte C. argue that the circuit court erred in failing to grant custody of Charlotte C.'s minor son, Ryan B., to Charlotte C., and in placing Ryan B. with Donna S., the mother of Nathan B., Ryan B.'s determined father. See footnote 2

The guardian ad litem also appeals the circuit court's denial of the guardian's motion to join as necessary parties to this action another child who was born to Charlotte during the pendency of this matter.

After reviewing the briefs and arguments of the parties and the record from the circuit court, we reverse the circuit court and remand the case for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.

I.

On January 5, 1995, 16-year-old Charlotte gave birth to Ryan. On the birth certificate Nathan B. was listed as the father of the child. Charlotte and Nathan were not married. At age 18, Charlotte quit school and married Wayne C., a soldier who was stationed in Texas. During this marriage, Charlotte and Wayne had one child, Tracy C. In June of 1997, Wayne went to Kuwait, and Charlotte moved to Preston County with her two children to live near Charlotte's family.

On August 27, 1997, the DHHR filed an abuse and neglect petition in the Circuit Court of Preston County. The petition alleged that Charlotte had failed to provide adequate adult supervision of her two children, Ryan B. and Tracy C. Specifically, the petition alleged that Charlotte had taken the two children to a bar so that she could make a phone call, and that while she made a phone call at a pay phone outside the bar, she left the two children unattended. During the 10-minute phone call, 2 1/2 year old Ryan was seen pushing 8-month-old Tracy along the side of the road in a baby carriage. After leaving the telephone, Charlotte began walking up the road with the two children. A Terra Alta Police Officer observed Charlotte pushing the baby carriage, but failing to adequately supervise Ryan as he walked along the road. The petition further alleged that Charlotte failed to show adequate concern for Ryan and by her actions placed her children at risk. Finally, after being confronted with these allegations by the DHHR, and after Charlotte refused to sign a “Protection Plan,”See footnote 3 [3] the petition was filed.

Subsequent to the filing of the petition, without a hearing, the circuit court determined that imminent danger existed to the two children and ordered that custody of the children be immediately transferred to the DHHR for foster home placement. The court also appointed a guardian ad litem to represent the children.

On September 5, 1997, a preliminary hearing was conducted and the court found probable cause that the allegations of neglect set forth in the petition were true and continued the placement of the children with DHHR.

Wayne, father of Tracy, filed for a motion for "Father's Immediate Custody" moving the court to terminate the temporary custody of Tracy with the DHHR and requested that the court place full custody with him, her father. A hearing was conducted on October 6, 1997, and an agreement was reached between the parties granting physical and legal custody of Tracy to her father, Wayne. See footnote 4 Charlotte was granted visitation.

On November 12, 1997, an adjudicatory hearing was conducted. Charlotte admitted that she had gone to a telephone outside of the bar on the morning of August 27, 1997 in order to make a telephone call. Charlotte testified that at no time were the children out of her sight. However, Charlotte admitted that her control and supervision of the children had been inadequate and neglectful on that date. The court accepted Charlotte's admissions and adjudged her to have neglected her children by failing to adequately supervise them when they were close to a dangerous highway.

By order dated December 1, 1997, the court terminated the temporary custody of Ryan with the DHHR and granted temporary custody to Donna S., See footnote 5 the child's paternal grandmother, a resident of Garrett County, Maryland.

On December 19, 1997, Charlotte filed a motion for a "Post-Adjudicatory Improvement Period." The court granted the motion on February 17, 1998, and provided for a 3-month improvement period. See footnote 6

A hearing was conducted on April 6, 1998 to review Charlotte's progress in the improvement period. Testimony was offered that Charlotte had failed to meet some of her required tasks. The court was also informed that Charlotte was pregnant with her third child and was due to deliver her baby in July of 1998. At the conclusion of the hearing the circuit court did not extend the improvement period, and the case was set for disposition.

On July 22, 1998, Charlotte gave birth to her third child, Nicholas. The guardian ad litem moved to join baby Nicholas and his father, Nicholas D. ("Nick") as necessary parties to the action. The circuit court denied this motion.

On August 6, 27, and 28, and on October 15 and 29, 1998, the circuit court conducted a continuing disposition hearing regarding Ryan. At the beginning of the hearing, the guardian ad litem renewed her motion to join, as necessary parties, baby Nicholas and his father Nick. The circuit court again denied this motion.

During the initial stages of the disposition hearing, the question of Ryan's paternity was raised. Over the objection of the guardian ad litem, the court ordered that Nathan, Ryan, and Charlotte submit to blood tests. These tests revealed that there was a zero percent possibility that Nathan was Ryan's father.

During the disposition hearing, Sharon McMillen, a licensed psychologist, was called by DHHR. Ms. McMillen testified that she believed that Ryan could safely be placed with his mother, Charlotte. Ms. McMillen also stated she had concerns about continued placement with grandmother Donna. Ms. McMillen testified that the grandmother had been very reluctant to be evaluated by Ms. McMillen. She further testified that grandmother Donna had been instructed to set up an appointment with her and had failed to do so. Also of concern to Ms. McMillen were Ryan's actions indicating that he may have acquired inappropriate sexual knowledge. Ms. McMillen opined that Ryan should be evaluated to determine if there had been sexual abuse.

The court also heard testimony from Emma Steelman, a social worker of 25 years and site director of Wellspring Family Services, an agency from which Charlotte had been receiving assistance for parental skills. Ms. Steelman believed Ryan should be placed with his mother, and that this placement would be in the best interests of the child.

Lisa Williams, a child protective worker with DHHR who had worked extensively with the parties in this case, also testified. Ms. Williams stated that it was the department's plan to reunite Charlotte with Ryan. Ms. Williams stated that Charlotte had made great strides in adhering to the goals established by DHHR. Ms. Williams also testified that it would be in Ryan's best interest to be reunited with his mother.

The court heard from Richard Kutchman, a child protective service worker for Garrett County, Maryland. Mr. Kutchman testified that the grandmother Donna had lost custody of all five of her children -- partially based on physical abuse. Mr. Kutchman reported that there had been allegations of abuse in grandmother Donna's household over a 13 year period. Mr. Kutchman stated that the grandmother would not be appropriate for long term placement of a child. Mr. Kutchman testified that grandmother Donna had pled guilty to felony theft approximately 2 years prior to the disposition hearing. Finally, Mr. Kutchman also stated that Nathan B. had been uncooperative in Mr. Kutchman's investigation.

Cheryl Dixon, a second social worker with Wellspring Family Services who had provided assistance to Charlotte, also testified. Ms. Dixon also testified that it would be in the child's best interests to be reunited with his mother.

Linda Beeler, a supervised but not licensed psychologist, was called by the guardian ad litem to testify. Ms. Beeler stated that she had been hired by Donna S. to evaluate the S. family. Ms. Beeler stated that her reports did not indicate that the family was abusive. However, Ms. Beeler admitted that there were discrepancies between what Donna had told Ms. Beeler and the actual reports of child abuse from Maryland authorities.

Finally, DHHR called Tammy Titchenell, a licensed counselor. Ms. Titchenell was requested by DHHR to evaluate Ryan for potential sexual abuse following Ms. McMillen's testimony. Ms. Titchenell stated that there was a potential sexual abuse problem and that grandmother Donna was using intimidation tactics to keep the child from fully discussing the matter. Ms. Titchenell recommended that Ryan be placed with his mother.

The DHHR submitted a case plan pursuant to W.Va. Code, 49-6-5(a) [1998] and recommended that Ryan be returned to Charlotte's custody while retaining legal custody in DHHR. See footnote 7 The guardian ad litem however, recommended that Ryan continue to be placed with grandmother Donna until Charlotte obtained her GED.

Following all of the testimony, the circuit court did not terminate the parental rights of Charlotte, but found that she was unable to adequately provide for Ryan's needs and assure his safety. Consequently, the circuit court appointed grandmother Donna as Ryan's guardian and continued physical custody of Ryan with Donna in Maryland. The circuit court also found that Nathan B. was the determined father See footnote 8 of Ryan. Following the entry of the order, both the guardian ad litem and Charlotte, joined by the DHHR, appealed.

II.

In Syllabus Point 1 of In re Tiffany S., 196 W.Va. 223, 470 S.E.2d 177 (1996), we set forth the standard of review for abuse and neglect cases:

> Although conclusions of law reached by a circuit court are subject to de novo review, when an action, such as an abuse and neglect case, is tried upon the facts without a jury, the circuit court shall make a determination based upon the evidence and shall make findings of fact and conclusions of law as to whether such child is abused or neglected. These findings shall not be set aside by a reviewing court unless clearly erroneous. A finding is clearly erroneous when, although there is evidence to support the finding, the reviewing court on the entire evidence is left with the definite > and firm conviction that a mistake has been committed. However, a reviewing court may not overturn a finding simply because it would have decided the case differently, and it must affirm a finding if the circuit court's account of the evidence is plausible in light of the record viewed in its entirety.

The DHHR and Charlotte jointly assert that the circuit court erred in failing to award Charlotte custody of Ryan, and in placing Ryan with grandmother Donna. Both the DHHR and Charlotte contend that the circuit court ignored the weight of evidence by refusing to grant Charlotte custody of Ryan. Conversely, the guardian ad litem argues that the circuit court weighed the evidence properly and that the placement of Ryan with his paternal grandmother was reasonable given the testimony offered during the disposition hearing.

The statutes of this State and opinions of this Court have traditionally protected the parent-child relationship. We have stated that "no rule is more firmly established than that the right of a natural parent to the custody of his or her infant child is paramount to that of any other person." In re Willis, 157 W.Va. 225, 237, 207 S.E.2d 129, 136 (1973).

In the instant case, the circuit court heard the testimony of multiple child professionals, all of whom, with the exception of Ms. Beeler and Mr. Kutchman, stated that the placement of Ryan with his mother Charlotte would be in the child's best interest or could be done safely because his mother had remedied those problems that first put Ryan in danger. Ms. Beeler was hired by Ryan's paternal grandmother, Donna, to ascertain whether the home of grandmother Donna was a suitable placement for Ryan, and did not offer an opinion on the suitability of placement of Ryan with his mother Charlotte. Mr. Kutchman, a child protective service worker from Maryland, testified that due to the history of abuse, he believed that any long term placement of a child with grandmother Donna would be inappropriate.

The court also heard testimony from child workers Ms. McMillen and Ms. Titchenell, both of whom expressed concerns with grandmother Donna. Ms. McMillen stated that Donna appeared reluctant to be interviewed and failed to make an appointment as requested. Ms. Titchenell, who evaluated Ryan interacting with both mother Charlotte and on another occasion with grandmother Donna, stated that Ryan was more of a "typical three year old with his mother than with his grandparents." See footnote 9

The record contains a great deal of testimony indicating that the placement of the child with grandmother Donna would be inappropriate, while the mother of the child has apparently taken substantial steps to remedy any safety problems. We have stated that "when the finding of a trial court in a case tried by it in lieu of a jury is against the preponderance of the evidence, is not supported by the evidence, or is plainly wrong, such finding will be reversed and set aside by this Court upon appellate review." Syllabus Point 1, in part, George v. Godby, 174 W.Va. 313, 325 S.E.2d 102 (1984). We have also held that "[a]s a general rule the least restrictive alternative regarding parental rights to custody of a child under W.Va. Code, 49-6-5 [1977] will be employed[.]" Syllabus Point 1, in part, In re R.J.M., 164 W.Va. 496, 266 S.E.2d 114 (1980).

Based on our review of the record we find that the circuit court did not properly weigh the preponderance of the evidence, and the decision to place Ryan in the custody of grandmother Donna was clearly erroneous. Accordingly, we reverse the circuit court's placement of Ryan with his paternal grandmother.

While we reverse the decision of the circuit court, we are mindful that Ryan has been in the care of his grandmother for some time, and that a transition period will be necessary in returning him to his mother. See, e.g., Syllabus Point 3, James v. Maynard, 185 W.Va. 648, 408 S.E.2d 400 (1991); Honaker v. Burnside, 182 W.Va. 448, 388 S.E.2d 322 (1989). The court should address this transition on remand.

In the second appeal, the guardian ad litem argues that the circuit court erred by failing to join Nicholas D., the child born of Charlotte during the pendency of this matter, and his father Nick D. as necessary parties to the case.

W.Va. Code, 49-6-3(a) [1998] provides, in part:

> [i]n a case where there is more than one child in the home, or in the temporary care, custody or control of the alleged offending parent, the petition shall so state, and notwithstanding the fact that the allegations of abuse or neglect may pertain to less than all of such children, each child in the home for whom relief is sought shall be made a party to the proceeding.

The language of this statute is clear: every child in the home "for whom relief is sought shall" be made a party. However, while each child in the care, custody or control of the alleged offending parent must be made a party, "[n]o decision to terminate parental rights could happen until the statutory requirements" are met. In re Lacey P., 189 W.Va. 580, 586 n. 5, 433 S.E.2d 518, 524 n. 5 (1993).

Regarding the joining of the father, Nick, W.Va. Code, 29-6-19(b) [1992] provides in part that "[t]he petition and notice of the hearing shall be served upon both parents and any other custodian, giving to such parents or custodian at least ten days' notice[.]" Since Nicholas was necessary as a party under W.Va. Code, 49-6-3(a), his father, Nick, also needed to be joined.

Consequently, the circuit court erred in denying the guardian ad litem's motion to join baby Nicholas and father Nick as necessary parties, and on this issue we reverse. See footnote 10

III.

Based upon the forgoing, the judgment of the Circuit Court of Preston County is reversed with respect to the placement of Ryan with his paternal grandmother Donna. We also reverse as to the circuit court's denial of the motion to join baby Nicholas and his father, Nick, as necessary parties.

We remand this case for further proceedings consistent with this opinion. We direct the court on remand to examine the best interests of the children of Charlotte, and mandate the DHHR to develop a plan that will result in a transition of custody of Ryan back to his mother, Charlotte.

Reversed and Remanded.

Footnote: 2 It was established during the course of these proceedings that Nathan B. could not be the biological father to Ryan. The circuit court, however, found that Nathan B. was the "determined father" of Ryan. According to W.Va. Code, 48-4-1(h)[1997] a "Determined Father" means a person in whom paternity has been established pursuant to W.Va. Code, 48A-6-1 et seq. Paternity may be established under W.Va. Code, 48A-6-6 [1997] by "[a] written, notarized acknowledgment by both the man and woman that the man is the father of the named child," and once established as the father, the man is acknowledged as the father of the child for all purposes, including having the obligation for child support.

Footnote: 3 The protection plan was not made part of the record. During the disposition hearing, several of the witnesses opined that Charlotte did not sign the protection plan because of her low reading level and her inability to understand what was being asked of her by the protection plan.

Footnote: 4 Apparently Charlotte and Wayne separated during these events and have subsequently obtained a divorce from each other. The custody of Tracy has been settled and was not made part of this appeal.

Footnote: 5 It would appear from the record that Ryan's father of record, Nathan B., did not provide any financial support for Ryan since the child's birth. The circuit court found that Nathan had not taken on the role of supporting Ryan, and was therefore not a proper person to have custody. Nathan lives with his mother, Donna, in Maryland.

Footnote: 6 The conditions for the improvement period were:

1. That temporary physical and legal custody of Ryan remain with the paternal grandmother, Donna S., pending completion of home studies to be conducted by the Garrett County, Maryland, Department of Social Services;

2. That custody and visitation of Tracy continue as set forth in the Agreed Custody Modification Order entered October 16, 1997;

3. That DHHR prepare and submit to the court for approval an individualized family case plan, to include but not limited to the following tasks by Charlotte C.:

(a) obtaining a permanent, safe, and suitable residence in Preston County, West Virginia,

(b) Securing employment;

(c) Working toward a G.E.D.;

(d) Attending and participating fully in counseling sessions and parenting classes; and

(e) Participating in regular, supervised visitation with Ryan[.]

Footnote: 7 The DHHR case plan provided the following as a "Permanency Plan" for Ryan B.:

It is the recommendation of the West Virginia Department of Health and Human Resources that [Ryan B.] be returned to the physical custody of his mother, with the state department retaining legal custody in order to monitor the placement and that the department be granted the ability to remove the child without prior court involvement if safety issues should arise. The department would then proceed with appropriate court action. The state department further stipulates that Charlotte will continue counseling as scheduled with Sharon McMillen and that these sessions will include Ryan. Charlotte will also participate in and cooperate with services provided by Wellspring. The department would also recommend that a transition period is not needed in the case, as Ryan has had continuous contact with his mother through weekly visits. If the court finds reunification is not in the best interest of [Ryan B.], the department would not recommend continued long term placement in the home of [Donna S.] due to the concerns of past abuse issues noted in the home study completed by Garrett County Office of Social Services[.] (Emphasis in original.)

Footnote: 9 In her recommendation, Ms. Titchenell stated the following:

Ryan has definitely been traumatized by his many placements and separation from his mother. He has an attachment to his mother which was very evident during their observation session. He is comfortable enough to share information with her and to express his feelings. He did not appear to have the same type relationship with [Donna S. and her husband]. He is also attached to them, but at a different level than his mother. Their interactions are more surface and side by side existence. Ryan's behavior was more typical of a three year old when he was with his mother than with his grandparents. Some of Ryan's behaviors and verbal cues lead me to believe his grandparents use intimidation tactics and speak poorly of his mother.

Footnote: 10 The guardian ad litem also assigns as error the circuit court's order requiring a paternity testing with respect to Ryan. However, as the court ruled that Nathan B. was the determined father of Ryan and granted him visitation, we find the issue moot and do not address it at this time.

IN RE: TRAVIS W.

No. 26640

Submitted: November 2, 1999
Filed: December 7, 1999

SYLLABUS BY THE COURT

1. "'Although conclusions of law reached by a circuit court are subject to de novo review, when an action, such as an abuse and neglect case, is tried upon the facts without a jury, the circuit court shall make a determination based upon the evidence and shall make findings of fact and conclusions of law as to whether such child is abused or neglected. These findings shall not be set aside by a reviewing court unless clearly erroneous. A finding is clearly erroneous when, although there is evidence to support the finding, the reviewing court on the entire evidence is left with the definite and firm conviction that a mistake has been committed. However, a reviewing court may not overturn a finding simply because it would have decided the case differently, and it must affirm a finding if the circuit court's account of the evidence is plausible in light of the record viewed in its entirety.' 2. Circuit courts must comply with Rule 31 of the West Virginia Rules of Procedure for Child Abuse and Neglect by providing notice of the date, time, and place of the disposition hearing to all parties, their counsel, and the CASA representative, if one was appointed.

3. Pursuant to Rule 32 of the West Virginia Rules of Procedure for Child Abuse and Neglect, circuit courts may hold accelerated disposition hearings immediately following adjudication hearings if: (1) the parties agree; (2) the child's case plan which meets the requirements of W.Va. Code §§ 49-6-5 and 49-6D-3 is provided to the court or the party or parties waive the requirement that the child's case plan be submitted prior to disposition; and (3) notice is provided or waived.

Maynard, Justice:
The appellant, Steve W., appeals the May 12, 1999 order of adjudication and disposition entered by the Circuit Court of Berkeley County, West Virginia. The appellant contends he received no notice that the circuit court would proceed immediately to disposition following the adjudication hearing. He also contends the West Virginia Department of Health and Human Resources (DHHR) did not file a child's case plan and that the circuit court wrongly determined he abandoned his child, Travis W. Because the West Virginia Rules of Procedure for Child Abuse and Neglect mandate that notice of the disposition hearing be provided, we reverse and remand.

The facts are essentially undisputed. Travis W. was born on September 29, 1997. His parents are Tessa F. and Steve W. In December 1998, DHHR filed two abuse and neglect petitions, designated 98-JA-35 and 98-JA-36, regarding Travis W. and Brandon F. respectively. See footnote 1Case number 98-JA-35, involving Travis W., made no allegations against Steve W. but rather simply stated that he is the father of the child. DHHR filed an amended petition on January 25, 1999, which recited the allegations contained in the original petition and added a paragraph that alleged the appellant failed and is unable to provide Travis W. with necessary food, clothing, shelter, supervision, and medical care.

An adjudication hearing on the original petition was held on January 22, 1999. At that time, the mother of both children, Tessa F., voluntarily relinquished her parental rights to Travis W. and Brandon F. and both children were placed in the custody of DHHR. The appellant made no appearance. A disposition hearing regarding the rights of both fathers was set for February 11, 1999. The appellant made no appearance; however, his counsel objected to proceeding with the hearing because his client may not have received copies of the petition and the amended petition. DHHR moved for a continuance and the disposition hearing was continued until March 12, 1999. The State then published notice of the court proceedings; the ad in the Martinsburg Journal advised that an adjudication hearing would take place regarding case 98-JA-35 on March 12, 1999.

On March 5, 1999, DHHR filed a child's case plan for Travis W. with the court. The case plan was copied to all attorneys of record and recommended termination of the appellant's parental rights. The case plan further identified a permanency plan which "includes the child remaining in the physical and legal custody of the maternal aunt See footnote 2 with leave to adopt." On March 12, 1999, the court dismissed the Brandon F. case, case 98-JA- 36, because Brandon F. was placed with his maternal grandmother and further state intervention was not required.

On March 12, 1999, the court scheduled an adjudication hearing for Travis W. to take place on March 25, 1999. At that hearing, appellant's counsel filed a motion to dismiss alleging that: (1) the amended petition failed to state sufficient facts and allegations against Steve W.; (2) the final adjudicatory hearing was not held timely according to Rule 25 of the West Virginia Rules of Procedure for Child Abuse and Neglect; and (3) the amended petition was filed after the adjudication on the initial petition in contravention of Rule 19 of the West Virginia Rules of Procedure for Child Abuse and Neglect. The court granted the motion to dismiss.

A new petition, designated 99-JA-18, containing more specific allegations against Steve W. was filed on April 8, 1999. The petition alleged that Travis W.'s physical and mental health was threatened by the appellant's failure and inability to provide for the child; the appellant had only limited contact with the child since birth; the appellant has a history of physical abuse; and Tessa F. was residing with the appellant after voluntarily relinquishing her parental rights to the child. See footnote 3 DHHR was granted temporary legal and physical custody of Travis W. based upon the allegations in the petition and the proffers of Sharon Wiley, DHHR's agent. The temporary custody order appointed counsel for all of the parties and set the matter for an adjudication hearing on April 26, 1999.

All parties and counsel appeared at the adjudication hearing. The court heard testimony from several witnesses, then recessed and continued the matter due to the lateness of the day. All parties and counsel reconvened on May 10, 1999, at which time the court continued to hear testimony. At the conclusion of the hearing, the court determined that the appellant had abandoned the child and that it was in the best interests of the child to terminate the appellant's parental rights and to allow the child to reside permanently with his great-aunt, Wendy H. On May 12, 1999, the court entered an order, titled "ORDER OF ADJUDICATION/DISPOSITION," which concluded that:

> the Respondent father is adjudicated as guilty of Abandonment of the infant child and his parental rights are hereby terminated. The Motion for Improvement Period filed on behalf of the Respondent Father is hereby denied.

CUSTODY

Both legal and physical custody of the Respondent child shall remain [with] Wendy H. where his best interest is being served. Ms. H. shall be allowed to take necessary steps for adoption.

It is from this order that Steve W. appeals.

The standard of review we apply in abuse and neglect cases was stated in syllabus point 1 of In re Tiffany Marie S., 196 W.Va. 223, 470 S.E.2d 177 (1996), and was reiterated in syllabus point 1 of In re George Glen B., ___ W.Va. ___, 518 S.E.2d 863 (1999), as follows:

> Although conclusions of law reached by a circuit court are subject to de novo review, when an action, such as an abuse and neglect case, is tried upon the facts without a jury, the circuit court shall make a determination based upon the evidence and shall make findings of fact and conclusions of law as to whether such child is abused or neglected. These findings shall not be set aside by a reviewing court unless clearly erroneous. A finding is clearly erroneous when, although there is evidence to support the finding, the reviewing court on the entire evidence is left with the definite and firm conviction that a mistake has been committed. However, a reviewing court may not overturn a finding simply because it would have decided the case differently, and it must affirm a finding if the circuit court's account of the evidence is plausible in light of the record viewed in its entirety.

On appeal, the appellant contends the circuit court erred by: (1) terminating his parental rights without conducting a disposition hearing; (2) proceeding to disposition without requiring DHHR to file the child's case plan; and (3) finding the child was abandoned. The initial issue which we must resolve is whether the circuit court erred by failing to follow procedural rules when the court terminated the appellant's parental rights without providing notice of the disposition hearing.

W.Va. Code § 49-6-5 (1998) controls the disposition of neglected or abused children and states in pertinent part:

> (a) Following a determination pursuant to section two [§ 49- 6-2] of this article wherein the court finds a child to be abused or neglected, the department shall file with the court a copy of the child's case plan, including the permanency plan for the child. . . . The court shall forthwith proceed to disposition giving both the petitioner and respondents an opportunity to be heard.

The Rules of Procedure for Child Abuse and Neglect require that notice of the disposition hearing be provided. Rule 31 states that “[n]otice of the date, time, and place of the disposition hearing shall be given by the court to all parties, their counsel, and the CASA representative, if one was appointed." Rule 32 sets forth the time frame for the disposition hearing and provides for accelerated disposition hearings, but only after certain enumerated requirements have been met. This rule reads as follows:

> (a) Time frame. -- The disposition hearing shall commence within forty-five (45) days of the entry of the final adjudicatory order unless an improvement period is granted pursuant to W. Va. Code § 49- 6-12(b) and then no later than sixty (60) days.
> (b) Accelerated disposition hearing. -- The disposition hearing immediately may follow the adjudication hearing if:
> (1) All the parties agree;
> (2) A child's case plan meeting the requirements of W. Va. Code §§ 49-6-5 and 49-6D-3 was completed and provided to the court or the party or the parties have waived the requirement that the child's case plan be submitted prior to disposition; and
> (3) Notice of the disposition hearing was provided to or waived by all parties as required by these Rules.

In the case at bar, the circuit court conducted the adjudication hearing on two separate dates. The hearing commenced on April 26, 1999. At the close of the hearing, the court entered an order of partial adjudication which concludes by stating that "[d]ue to the lateness of the day it is hereby Adjudged And Ordered that: This matter shall come on for continuation of the Adjudicatory Hearing on May 10, 1999 at 4:00 p.m." The court reconvened the adjudication hearing on May 10, 1999. No one contends the appellant was provided with notice that the court would proceed to disposition at the conclusion of the adjudication hearing. DHHR argues instead that the appellant cannot object to immediate disposition for the first time on appeal after failing to object during the hearing and that the best interests of the child were promoted by immediate disposition. The guardian ad litem reasons the court did not err in terminating the appellant's parental rights at the close of the adjudication hearing without conducting a disposition hearing because the appellant was found to have abandoned the child.

We are not persuaded by either of these arguments. The appellant avers that the court provided no notice, either before or during the hearing, that disposition would take place at the close of the adjudication hearing. Thus, says the appellant, he had no opportunity to object prior to the court's announcement of termination. He states that he objected to the ruling as soon as the court stated its intention. The order reflects this by stating, “The respondents objection to all adverse ruling[s] are noted by the Court[.]”

Pursuant to Rule 46 of the West Virginia Rules of Civil Procedure, this issue is preserved for appeal. Rule 46 reads as follows:

> Formal exceptions to rulings or orders of the court are unnecessary; but for all purposes for which an exception has heretofore been necessary it is sufficient that a party, at the time the ruling or order of the court is made or sought, makes known to the court the action which the party desires the court to take or the party's objection to the action of the court and the grounds therefor; and, if a party has no opportunity to object to a ruling or order at the time it is made, the absence of an objection does not thereafter prejudice the party.

This rule was explained in syllabus point 1 of Konchesky v. S. J. Groves and Sons Co., 148 W.Va. 411, 135 S.E.2d 299 (1964), which states:

> Rule 46 of the West Virginia Rules of Civil Procedure provides that in lieu of a formal exception it is sufficient if a party against whom a ruling or order is made opposes the action taken by the court at the time it is made and indicates the action which he desires, or, if such party did not have an opportunity to object at the time any ruling or order was made by the trial court on a motion of the opposing party, no objection or exception is required and an appellate court may consider the alleged error even though no formal objection or exception was made or taken.

We do not have the advantage of the transcript of the hearing on appeal. Therefore, we cannot search for specific objections. Nonetheless, the court noted the appellant's objection to all adverse rulings and would not have done so if the appellant had not opposed the action taken by the court. As the objection complies with Rule 46, we will consider the merits of the alleged error.

We believe the judge determined the result would be the same regardless of whether he proceeded immediately to disposition after the adjudicatory hearing or held a separate disposition hearing. According to W.Va. Code § 49-6-5(a)(6) (1998), adoption cannot take place until all proceedings for termination of parental rights are final. Rather than continuing to hold the child in limbo, the judge decided that immediately instituting the permanency plan was in the child's best interest. Under the facts of this case, we do not disagree. However, the court's action does not comply with the rules in that the appellant was not provided with notice of the hearing. Notice is mandatory. Rule 31 provides that notice shall be given by the court. See footnote 4Rule 32 provides that the court may hold an accelerated disposition hearing immediately following the adjudication hearing but only if the parties agree, the case plan was submitted or the requirement that the case plan be submitted prior to disposition was waived, and notice was provided or waived. It is not disputed that these requirements were not met in this case. The appellant contends that he was utterly surprised by the court's decision to terminate his rights. The circuit court must hold a disposition hearing which complies with these rules.

Pursuant to statutory law and the rules of procedure, circuit courts must provide the parties with notice of the disposition hearing prior to actually holding the hearing. We, therefore, hold that in conformance with Rule 31 of the West Virginia Rules of Procedure for Child Abuse and Neglect, notice of the date, time, and place of the disposition hearing must be given by the court to all parties, their counsel, and the CASA representative, if one was appointed. We further adjudge that pursuant to Rule 32, circuit courts may hold accelerated disposition hearings immediately following adjudication hearings if: (1) the parties agree; (2) the child's case plan which meets the requirements of W.Va. Code §§ 49-6- 5 and 49-6D-3 is provided to the court or the party or the parties waive the requirement that the child's case plan be submitted prior to disposition; and (3) notice is provided or waived.

The child's case plan is not as problematic. W.Va. Code § 49-6-5(a) dictates that a child's case plan must be filed with the court when a child is found to be abused or neglected. This code section also contains a detailed definition of “case plan” by stating:

> (a) Following a determination pursuant to section two [§ 49-6-2] of this article wherein the court finds a child to be abused or neglected, the department shall file with the court a copy of the child's case plan, including the permanency plan for the child. The term case plan means a written document that includes, where applicable, the requirements of the family case plan as provided for in section three [§ 49-6D-3], article six-d of this chapter and that also includes at least the following: A description of the type of home or institution in which the child is to be placed, including a discussion of the appropriateness of the placement and how the agency which is responsible for the child plans to assure that the child receives proper care and that services are provided to the parents, child and foster parents in order to improve the conditions in the parent(s) home, facilitate return of the child to his or her own home or the permanent placement of the child, and address the needs of the child while > in foster care, including a discussion of the appropriateness of the services that have been provided to the child. The term permanency plan refers to that part of the case plan which is designed to achieve a permanent home for the child in the least restrictive setting available. The plan must document efforts to ensure that the child is returned home within approximate time lines for reunification as set out in the plan. Reasonable efforts to place a child for adoption or with a legal guardian may be made at the same time reasonable efforts are made to prevent removal or to make it possible for a child to safely return home. If reunification is not the permanency plan for the child, the plan must state why reunification is not appropriate and detail the alternative placement for the child to include approximate time lines for when such placement is expected to become a permanent placement. This case plan shall serve as the family case plan for parents of abused or neglected children. Copies of the child's case plan shall be sent to the child's attorney and parent, guardian or custodian or their counsel at least five days prior to the dispositional hearing.

In the case at bar, a child's case plan was not submitted on Travis W.'s behalf when the new petition was filed; however, a case plan was submitted to the court in the companion case, 98-JA-35. That plan was copied to all the parties involved in Travis W.'s case. The appellant, the department, and the guardian ad litem attached a copy of the case plan to the briefs they submitted to this Court on appeal. The appellant attended the hearings which were held in the companion case. That case was dismissed for procedural reasons and the petition which was filed in this case is substantially, if not completely, identical to the dismissed petition. The permanency plan included in the case plan is the plan adopted by the court. We believe the parties were aware the child's case plan remained in full force and effect after the companion case was dismissed.

Moreover, DHHR suggests that if the judge had asked for a new case plan, the department would simply have copied the plan which was submitted in the companion case and would have resubmitted it to the court, causing needless procedural delay. Even though that is true in this case and does not constitute reversible error, the better practice for circuit courts to follow is to require that a child's case plan be filed in each and every child abuse and neglect action that is instituted.

The appellant does not strongly contend the court erred in finding he abandoned the child. His entire argument to this Court consists of the following:

> Appellant testified that he lived with the mother of the child for approximately the first six months of the child's life and that he was very involved in the care of the child. This testimony was corroborated by testimony from the child's mother. The Appellant further testified that the child's mother moved out with the child, and that, for many months she would not disclose her whereabouts to him. Appellant saw the child on occasion, mostly when the mother would come to visit, from the time she moved out, until the Department's involvement. Once Appellant became aware of the abuse and neglect proceedings, he participated and tried to gain custody of the child until the final order was entered.
> The child was not abandoned by Appellant, and the Court's ruling on that matter is clearly wrong.

The following people testified before the circuit court: Terry M., Travis W.'s maternal grandmother; Wendy H., the child's guardian and caretaker; Tiffany H., Wendy's daughter; Sharon Wiley, agent of DHHR; and the appellant. In its order of partial- adjudication, the court summarized the testimony of each of these witnesses. Terry M. testified that, to her knowledge, the appellant had seen Travis W. just two times in more than a year. She testified that she had seen the appellant assault Tessa F. and she herself had been hit by Steve W. Wendy H. testified that Travis W. had been in her physical care for thirteen months; during that time, the appellant had seen the infant two times. She testified that the appellant provides no support for the child, and she heard him say, “If he couldn't have Tessa he really didn't want Travis.”

Tiffany H. testified that the appellant “slammed” Brandon F. to the ground when the child was six or seven months old and the appellant was annoyed with him for crying. Sharon Wiley testified that she had not spoken with the appellant, but she was aware of another case in which the appellant had abandoned his child, Brian W., on three different occasions. She also stated that the terminated mother had said that she was trying to get the children back through this proceeding. Ms. Wiley noted that there is evidence that Brian W. sexually abused Brandon F.

The appellant testified that he had pushed Tessa F. in anger. She then fell against her mother, cutting Terry M.'s lip. He testified that he had seen Travis W. six or seven times during the months he did not live with him. He admitted he may have said he did not want Travis W. but did not mean it. He stated he had not abused his children. He admitted he has not sought visitation with Travis W. nor has he paid child support. He also testified that he has been employed for almost two years and can financially support the child.

Based on these representations, the court made the following findings of fact in its final order:

> The Respondent Mother lives in an apartment owned by and on the same premises as the Respondent Father;
> The Respondent Father was convicted of a domestic battery in his ex-wife in August 1996;
> There has been testimony of violence by the Respondent Father against Tessa F. and her mother;
> The Respondent Mother and Father lived together again after the Respondent Mother relinquished her parental rights;
> The Respondent Mother made the statement that she would try to get her child back;
> The Respondent Father made the statement that if he could not have Tessa F., he did not want Travis;
> The Respondent Father was not interested in any proceedings concerning his son Travis or visiting his son until the Respondent Mother relinquished her parental rights.

The court then concluded that Travis W. is an abandoned child. Based on the representations made to the trial court, we cannot say the court erred in reaching this conclusion. During the time the appellant was absent from Travis W.'s life, the child suffered spiral fractures of both legs, severe burns on his face, and numerous cuts and bruises. The appellant admits he made little or no attempt to contact the child and offered no support.

We believe the record shows the appellant abandoned Travis W. and that there is no reasonable likelihood that the conditions of abuse and neglect can be substantially corrected. W.Va. Code § 49-6-5(a)(6) (1998) provides that courts should terminate parental rights "[u]pon a finding that there is no reasonable likelihood that the conditions of neglect or abuse can be substantially corrected in the near future, and when necessary for the welfare of the child[.]" Furthermore, "[f]or purposes of the court's consideration of the disposition custody of a child pursuant to the provisions of this subsection the department is not required to make reasonable efforts to preserve the family if the court determines: (A) The parent has subjected the child to aggravated circumstances which include abandonment[.]" W.Va. Code § 49-6-5(a)(7)(A) (1998), in part. The end result of this case will doubtless be the same regardless of whether or not the court provides notice of and holds a disposition hearing. However, neither this Court nor circuit courts can simply ignore mandatory procedural requirements. Circuit courts simply must comply with statutory law and the rules of procedure.

For the foregoing reasons, we affirm the finding of abandonment but reverse the disposition and remand for the circuit court to conduct a disposition hearing which complies with W.Va. Code § 49-6-5 and Rules 31 and 32 of the West Virginia Rules of Procedure for Child Abuse and Neglect.

Affirmed in part; reversed in part and remanded.

JUSTICE NEELY delivered the Opinion of the Court.

SYLLABUS BY THE COURT

1. This Court has repeatedly held that in a contest involving the custody of an infant where there is no biological parent involved, the best interests of the child are the polar star by which the discretion of the court will be guided.

2. The best interests of a child are served by preserving important relationships in that child's life.

Neely, J.:

This is a custody dispute between foster parents, Cletis and Janet Browning, appellants, See footnote 1 who have looked after Angela Pearl Meadows since she was ten months old (and now want to adopt her) and little Angela's half-sister (who also wants to adopt Angela). The half-sister, Rita McCoy Stetson, has had virtually no contact with Angela since Angela's birth. The Brownings have cared for Angela since May, 1990, when Angela was less than a year old. The Circuit Court of Fayette County held that custody should be transferred to Ms. Stetson and her husband. However, the circuit court based his decision on the "rights" of the sister, not on the best interests of Angela. Our "polar star" in determining the custody of a child where there is no biological parent involved is the welfare and best interests of the child. We find that it is in the best interests of Angela to remain with her foster parents, the Brownings.

Angela was born on 20 June 1989. Her father, Richard McCoy, had a long history of sexually abusing his female relatives. Angela's mother, Stella Steele, was Richard McCoy's niece and a victim of incest at Mr. McCoy's hands. Angela was conceived from that union. Stella Steele and Mary McCoy, one of Mr. McCoy's daughters, brought incest charges against Mr. McCoy through the Fayette County Sheriff's Department. Mr. McCoy, upon discovering that Ms. Steele had filed incest charges against him, murdered Stella Steele on 13 April 1990. On 18 April 1990, Angela was removed from the McCoy home and taken into custody by the Department of Health and Human Resources (DHHR). Mr. McCoy is currently serving a life sentence for the murder of Angela's mother.

Ms. Stetson and her husband, appellees, were awarded custody of Angela by the Circuit Court. Ms. Stetson was born in 1963. Mr. McCoy, Angela's father, is also Ms. Stetson's father. When Ms. Stetson was seven years old, Mr. McCoy began sexually abusing her. Ms. Stetson ran away from home when she was twelve years old. She has not lived with her family since that time, and she has had virtually no contact with Angela. Ms. Stetson, as a result of the abuse by Mr. McCoy, cannot bear children. By all accounts Ms. Stetson is stable and has a loving relationship with her husband. The Rhode Island Department of Children and their Families conducted two home studies of the Stetsons and concluded both times that they would be fit parents.

On 30 April 1990, the circuit court held a custody review hearing. At this hearing, Rita McCoy Stetson came forward and asked to adopt Angela See footnote 2 However, Gail Treadway, the DHHR caseworker assigned to Angela told the court that she would need to have a home study performed by Rhode Island before she would agree to the adoption by Ms. Stetson. See footnote 3 Furthermore, the circuit court noted that paternity of the child had not yet been established (there were two possible fathers, one of whom wanted custody). The court granted temporary custody of Angela to DHHR for six months. Inexplicably, no six month review hearing was held.

The next hearing was held by the circuit court on 15 May 1991. The circuit court was presented with the home study report, and the determination that Mr. McCoy was, in fact, the father. The court then held that the matter was not ripe for consideration because the Rhode Island home study was over seven months old and Mr. McCoy had not been present nor had he had a guardian ad litem been appointed to represent him. The court then ordered DHHR to request a new home study and Mr. McCoy to be represented by a guardian ad litem. DHHR did not request an updated home study from Rhode Island until 9 October 1991, nearly five months after the court ordered DHHR to request the report. DHHR received the second Rhode Island home study in December, 1991.

The most recent custody hearing was held on 28 February 1992. Richard McCoy admitted paternity and voluntarily waived all parental rights to Angela. See footnote 4 The circuit court reviewed the updated home study of the Stetsons, and heard the DHHR recommendation that custody of Angela should be awarded to the Stetsons. However, Angela's guardian ad litem objected to that recommendation, saying that Angela would be better served by being adopted by the Brownings, her custodians since before she was a year old.

Ever since May 1990, just after the initial custody hearing, Angela has resided with the Brownings under a foster care agreement. Throughout all of this litigation and bureaucratic delay, Angela has lived with the Brownings as their daughter. Angela suffers from cystic fibrosis; in order to make sure that Mr. and Mrs. Browning could care for Angela properly, the Brownings completed special training courses in how to care for a child with cystic fibrosis. At the February 1992, hearing, the Brownings testified to the circuit court that they wished to adopt Angela. The circuit court found that the Brownings had developed strong emotional ties with Angela.

Despite that finding of strong emotional ties, however, the circuit court, in his opinion letter of 6 March 1992 held:

It is regrettable, but true, that the State of West Virginia's administrative handling of this matter, insofar as Angela Pearl Meadows, infant, is concerned, certainly lacks the quality of work and attention one would and should expect in such a very delicate and important matter. Such poor work has, wrongly or rightly, caused the foster parents, Mr. and Mrs. Browning, to develop certain expectations about the outcome of this case, and certainly they have formed a loving attachment to the infant. Nevertheless, I am unaware of any law which vests contractual foster parents with any legal rights which would rise to the level of "parental rights".

We share the circuit court's shock and dismay at the conduct of DHHR in this matter. DHHR's bureaucratic bungling has created this regrettable situation. Had DHHR promptly requested the home study from Rhode Island and then promptly requested a hearing before the circuit court within six months of the initial custody placement (as it should have) then the circuit court would have been able properly to award custody of Angela to the Stetsons in the fall of 1990. Instead, the bureaucracy crept along at an incompetent pace and the child who was supposed to be in temporary custody wound up staying with the foster parents for nearly three years.

This is a travesty that all of us involved in the child welfare system (courts, lawyers, and executive agencies) must not allow to be repeated. Article III, § 17 of the West Virginia Constitution provides that "justice shall be administered without sale, denial or delay." This provision imposes an affirmative duty on the DHHR and the courts to ensure that child custody matters are resolved as quickly as possible. W. Va. Dept. of Human Serv. v. La Rea Ann C.L., 175 W. Va. 330, 337 n. 8, 332 S.E.2d 632, 638, n. 8 (1985). Finger pointing does no good, for the harm caused is irreparable. No matter who is responsible for the delay in this case, all of the parties involved are innocent and unwitting victims, caught up in the cogs of bureaucratic machinery.

Although we sympathize with the circuit court's desire to put the adult parties in the same position they would have enjoyed had the bureaucratic errors not occurred, we find that the circuit court erred by awarding custody to the Stetsons. Both statutory law and case law lead to the conclusion that custody should have been awarded to the Brownings.

"The controlling principle in every such case [where no biological parent is involved] is the welfare of the child and this Court has repeatedly said that in a contest involving the custody of an infant the welfare of the child is the polar star by which the discretion of the court will be guided." State ex rel. Kiger v. Hancock, 153 W.Va. 404, 405 168 S.E.2d 798, 799 (1969) (quoted approvingly in Honaker v. Burnside, 182 W.Va. 448, 450-451, 388 S.E.2d 322, 324 (1989)). This discretion is limited by the right of a natural parent to raise his or her own child. See Honaker v. Burnside, 182 W.Va. 448, 451, 388 S.E.2d 322, 324-325 (1989).

Although the circuit court discussed "parental rights" in his opinion letter, such rights are not at issue in this case. See footnote 5 The question is not who, the Stetsons or the Brownings, has "better" rights to custody of Angela, but with which custodian are Angela's best interests served.

The Legislature has expressly encouraged foster parents who develop emotional ties to the children for whom they care to adopt those children. W.Va. Code 49-2-17 [1978]. This section subsidizes adoptions by such foster parents:

Whenever significant emotional ties have been established between a child and his foster parents, and the foster parents seek to adopt the child, the child shall be certified as eligible for subsidy conditioned upon his adoption under applicable adoption procedures by the parents.

The goal is to encourage foster parents not to treat the children placed in their care as an income producing commodity, but rather to love their foster children as their own. The Legislature wants foster parents to know that if they become attached to a child in their care, the bureaucrats will not come and take the child away. Presumptively, if a child is in a loving and caring foster home, the child will be harmed by being removed from that home and placed in a strange, unknown home. The state, therefore, has implemented a policy encouraging foster parents to adopt their foster children.

In our case law, we have also developed a policy that stable relationships should be preserved whenever feasible. We have held that the best interests of the child often include being kept with his or her siblings. James M. v. Maynard, 185 W.Va. 648, 658, 408 S.E.2d 400, 410 (1991). However, this is not a rule to be applied by rote:

The increased professional emphasis in social work on the sibling relationship is consistent with the broadening focus of the literature about separation. [Citation omitted] The growing legal emphasis on the best interests of the child as the primary criterion for child placement decisions facilitates efforts to preserve stable relationships for children. [Emphasis added] James M., 185 W.Va. at 658, 408 S.E.2d at 410. If a child has a close bond to a sibling, then an appropriate factor in considering the custody of the child is to keep the siblings together. Ms. Stetson, although a half-sister, has had virtually no contact with Angela at any time in Angela's life. The only stable relationship in Angela's life is with the Brownings.

In W. Va. Dept. of Human Serv. v. La Rea Ann C.L., 175 W.Va. 330, 332 S.E.2d 632 (1985), we acknowledged that sometimes these strong emotional bonds may rise to the level of overwhelming the rights of a natural parent:

[W]here the child has spent a substantial period of time in the home of foster parents, pending a ruling by the trial court on whether to approve a minor parent's relinquishment of child custody, extraordinary circumstances exist which demand that the best interests of the child not only be considered but be given primary importance. In such a case the minor parent's right to revoke his or her relinquishment ceases to be absolute, due to the passage of the unreasonable period of time.

La Rea Ann C.L., 175 W.Va. at 335, 332 S.E.2d at 636. Accord, in re Baby Boy Reyna, 55 Cal.App.3d 288, 302, 126 Cal.Rptr 138, 147 (1976) (The best interests of the child are not served by "uproot[ing] the child from the care and love of the nonparents with whom it has been living for a substantial period of time and plac[ing] it with the father with whom it has never had contact."); Honaker, 182 W.Va. at 452, 388 S.E.2d 322, 326 (1989) ("Elizabeth has been through a most traumatic ordeal by losing her mother at such a tender age. Taking away continued contact with the two other most important figures in her life would be detrimental to her stability and well-being.").

Although we sympathize with the plight of the Stetsons, we must look to the best interests of Angela today, not as her best interests might have been when the Stetsons first requested custody. See footnote 6 The best interests of a child are served by preserving important relationships in that child's life. Often, but not always, those relationships are with family members, such as a parent, a sibling or an aunt. However, in this case the most meaningful, stable relationship that Angela has is with the Brownings. Accordingly, Angela's best interests will be served by preserving that relationship and allowing the Brownings to adopt Angela.

For the foregoing reasons, the decision of the Circuit Court of Fayette County is reversed, and the case remanded for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.

Reversed and Remanded.

Footnote: 1 Angela's guardian ad litem, D. Clinton Gallaher, IV, is also an appellant in this case supporting the right of the Brownings to adopt Angela as being in Angela's best interests.

Footnote: 2 At the time of this hearing, paternity of Angela was not yet established. Boyd Steele, Jr. (Stella's widower), who had previously denied paternity, now claimed he was the father and requested custody. Blood tests later established that Mr. Steele was not the father.

Footnote: 3 On 30 June 1990, over two months after Ms. Treadway stated that Rhode Island needed to perform a home study, DHHR finally requested that Rhode Island perform the study. On 28 September 1990, Rhode Island sent its report to DHHR. DHHR does not account for its delay in requesting the study.

Footnote: 4 The circuit court terminated Mr. McCoy's parental rights at the 28 February 1992 hearing. See Transcript at 47-48. In the court's order of 1 April 1992, the court found "[t]hat Richard McCoy is the biological father of Angela Pearl Meadows, and that he has been fully advised of all of his parental rights, and furthermore, that he has relinquished all of his parental rights in regard to Angela Pearl Meadows." Order, 1 April 1992.

Footnote: 5 Consideration of parental rights is irrelevant in this case, as Angela's only living parent is Mr. McCoy, who has voluntarily relinquished his parental rights. Therefore, the only consideration in this case is the best interests of Angela.

Footnote: 6 In La Rea Ann C.L., supra, we described a Pennsylvania court ruling that despite attachments developed subsequent to the bringing of the action, the Court felt compelled to decide the case as if it were the first hearing. We then rejected that position, holding, "we, on the other hand, believe that the appropriate procedure is to [decide the case] on the existing state of facts, rather than mak[e] a decision on a 'stale' record." SUPREME COURT OF APPEALS
OF WEST VIRGINIA

State of West Virginia ex rel. Tristen K., Petitioner, vs.) No. 35718

Honorable David R. Janes, Judge of the Circuit Court of Marion County, and the West Virginia Department of Health and Human Resources, Respondents.

Petition for Writ of Prohibition from the Circuit Court of Marion County
Civil Action No. 10-JA-2

On October 27, 2010, this Court issued a rule to show cause against the respondent, the Honorable David R. Janes, Judge of the Circuit Court of Marion County, as a result of a petition for writ of prohibition filed by the guardian ad litem (hereinafter "guardian") for the minor child, Tristen K.[1] (hereinafter "Tristen" or "minor"). The requested writ is based on an order, rendered orally by the lower court on September 9, 2010,[2] which granted a ninety-day, pre-adjudicatory improvement period for Tristen's biological parents: Joshua K. (hereinafter "Joshua" or "father") and Alexsis S. (hereinafter "Alexsis" or "mother"). The guardian requests this Court to prohibit the granting of the pre-adjudicatory improvement

[2]There is no disagreement as to the terms of the oral order by the circuit court. This Court notes that, prior to the oral arguments before this Court, a written order memorializing the oral mandate was received. It was dated November 9, 2010, and entered into the records of the circuit clerk's office that same date.

periods so that the case may proceed immediately to adjudication.[3] Pursuant to a request under Rule 14(b) of the Rules of Appellate Procedure came the respondent, the West Virginia Department of Health and Human Resources (hereinafter "DHHR"), and filed its response. Having thoroughly considered the matters raised in the petition, the response thereto, the oral arguments of counsel, and the applicable law, we determine that the issue is moot. Accordingly, the petition is dismissed, and the writ is denied.

Factually, the minor, Tristen, who is the subject of the underlying action, was born August 5, 2009, to Alexsis and Joshua. The DHHR filed a petition for abused or neglected children on January 5, 2010. The petition alleged that Joshua puts his hand over Tristen's mouth to keep him from crying, that he yells at him to be quiet and calls him a "f*cking retard," and that he picks the baby up by the baby's shirt and lets his head fall back. The father admitted to the police that he covers the baby's mouth with his hand and that he took Tristen into the woods to go "coon hunting." The mother, Alexsis, admitted that she allows Joshua to cover Tristen's mouth with his hand and that she has heard the profanities used by Joshua toward Tristen. It also was alleged that Alexsis would hold the baby without supporting his head. Based on the allegations in the abuse and neglect petition, Joshua and [3]During oral arguments before this Court, the guardian conceded that the parents have a right to an improvement period; however, the guardian's issue with the granting of the pre-adjudicatory improvement period lies in the fact that the lower court continually delayed the adjudicatory hearing and then granted a pre-adjudicatory improvement period after the already-substantial delays in the petition. The guardian argued that the case should proceed immediately to adjudication and that a post-adjudicatory improvement period could be requested and granted, if appropriate.

Alexsis were arrested for child abuse. Alexsis posted bond prior to the preliminary hearing. Joshua did not post bond until the following summer.

Alexsis filed a motion for a pre-adjudicatory improvement period on January 14, 2010. The preliminary hearing was held January 15, 2010, at which time both Alexsis and Joshua waived their rights to a preliminary hearing. An adjudicatory hearing was set for March 15, 2010; however, the date had to be rescheduled to May 6, 2010, due to a trial in the lower court that had not finished in the time expected. On March 16, 2010, Alexsis re-filed her motion for a pre-adjudicatory improvement period. A hearing was held May 6, 2010, for the purposes of adjudication; however, because the North Central Regional Jail failed to transport Joshua to the hearing, it was continued without objection from any of the parties. During the May 6th hearing, the DHHR informed the court that Alexsis was participating in services and following all recommendations of the multidisciplinary team (hereinafter "MDT"). The adjudicatory hearing was rescheduled to July 1, 2010.

In the interim, the lower court held a review hearing on June 1, 2010. The DHHR again reported that Alexsis was participating in all services and following all of the MDT's recommendations. Further, it was reported that Joshua was not participating in services due to his incarceration, but that services would be offered upon his release. The July 1, 2010, scheduled hearing was rescheduled due to the unavailability of a material witness. The new date was set for September 9, 2010. Prior to the hearing, on September 6, 2010, Joshua filed a motion for a pre-adjudicatory improvement period.

The lower court held a hearing on September 9, 2010, and considered the motions for pre-adjudicatory improvement periods filed by both Alexsis and Joshua. The DHHR represented that it was in accord with the granting of the requested improvement periods because both parents were participating in services and following the MDT's recommendations. The guardian, however, objected to the granting of the requested pre-adjudicatory improvement periods because of the eight-month delay between the inception of the abuse and neglect case and the date of the hearing. The circuit court granted a ninety-day pre-adjudicatory improvement period to each parent. It is from this order granting the pre-adjudicatory improvement periods that the petitioner seeks a writ of prohibition from this Court so that the case may proceed to adjudication.

Generally, "[a] writ of prohibition will not issue to prevent a simple abuse of discretion by a trial court. It will only issue where the trial court has no jurisdiction or having such jurisdiction exceeds its legitimate powers. W. Va. Code 53-1-1." Syl. pt. 2, State ex rel. Peacher v. Sencindiver, 160 W. Va. 314, 233 S.E.2d 425 (1977). In the underlying case, the argument revolves around the granting of pre-adjudicatory improvement periods and the guardian's disagreement therewith based on the guardian's position that the case should have proceeded to adjudication. Based on the lower court's order, an adjudicatory hearing is set for November 29, 2010, and it is reported that the parents are doing well participating in their improvement periods.[4] The parties indicated, during oral argument before this Court, that the hearing had actually been set since the September 9, 2010, hearing. As such, the guardian's requests for relief from this Court has become moot. "Courts will not ordinarily decide a moot question." Syl. pt. 1, Tynes v. Shore, 117 W. Va. 355, 185 S.E. 845 (1936). "Moot questions or abstract propositions, the decision of which would avail nothing in the determination of controverted rights of persons or of property, are not properly cognizable by a court." Syl. pt. 1, State ex rel. Lilly v. Carter, 63 W. Va. 684, 60 S.E. 873 (1908). Accordingly, because an adjudicatory hearing is already set to convene November 29, 2010, which will also evaluate the success of the pre-adjudicatory improvement periods, we find the issues before this Court to be moot.

While the guardian's requests are moot, we remain troubled by the expanse of time involved in this case and feel compelled to remind the lower court of the time frames involved in abuse and neglect cases, as well as the priority that should be placed on such cases. The petition was filed January 5, 2010, and the adjudicatory hearing, wherein the pre-adjudicatory improvement periods were granted, did not occur until eight months later on September 9, 2010, with the result of that hearing being a granting of pre-adjudicatory improvement periods and the setting of a new date for adjudication on November 29, 2010.

[4]It is also recognized that no party had a need to request early termination of the improvement periods as is contemplated by W. Va. Code § 49-6-12(h) (1996) (Repl. Vol. 2009), which provides that "[u]pon the motion by any party, the court shall terminate any improvement period granted pursuant to this section when the court finds that respondent has failed to fully participate in the terms of the improvement period."

As set forth in the statutory law:

> Any petition filed and any proceeding held under the provisions of this article shall, to the extent practicable, be given priority over any other civil action before the court, except . . . actions in which trial is in progress. Any petition filed under the provisions of this article shall be docketed immediately upon filing. . . .

W. Va. Code § 49-6-2(d) (2006) (Repl. Vol. 2009). This Court has explained that > [t]he clear import of the statute [West Virginia Code § 49-6-2(d)] is that matters involving the abuse and neglect of children shall take precedence over almost every other matter with which a court deals on a daily basis, and it clearly reflects the goal that such proceedings must be resolved as expeditiously as possible.

Syl. pt. 5, In Interest of Carlita B., 185 W. Va. 613, 408 S.E.2d 365 (1991). "Child abuse and neglect cases must be recognized as being among the highest priority for the courts' attention. Unjustified procedural delays wreak havoc on a child's development, stability and security. . . ." Syl. pt. 1, in part, Carlita B., id. Prompt resolution in such cases serves as a protection for children from the turmoil associated with the lack of stability in their surroundings and in their caretakers. See Syl. pt. 3, in part, James M. v. Maynard, 185 W. Va. 648, 408 S.E.2d 400 (1991) ("It is a traumatic experience for children to undergo sudden and dramatic changes in their permanent custodians.").

Accordingly, while we do not condone the delays involved in the underlying case, we hereby find that the issues presented in the requested writ are moot as a result of the scheduled adjudicatory hearing set for November 29, 2010. Therefore, the writ of prohibition is denied.

SYLLABUS BY THE COURT

1. "Parental rights may be terminated where there is clear and convincing evidence that the infant child has suffered extensive physical abuse while in the custody of his or her parents, and there is no reasonable likelihood that the conditions of abuse can be substantially corrected because the perpetrator of the abuse has not been identified and the parents, even in the face of knowledge of the abuse, have taken no action to identify the abuser." Syllabus Point 3, In re Jeffrey R.L., 190 W.Va. 24, 435 S.E.2d 162 (1993).

2. "'W.Va.Code, 49-1-3(a) (1984), in part, defines an abused child to include one whose parent knowingly allows another person to commit the abuse. Under this standard, termination of parental rights is usually upheld only where the parent takes no action in the face of knowledge of the abuse or actually aids or protects the abusing parent.' 3. "'Termination of parental rights of a parent of an abused child is authorized under W.Va.Code, 49-6-1 to 49-6-10, as amended, where such parent contends nonparticipation in the acts giving rise to the termination petition but there is clear and convincing evidence that such nonparticipating parent knowingly took no action to prevent or stop such acts to protect the child. Furthermore, termination of parental rights of a parent of an abused child is authorized under W.Va.Code, 49-6-1 to 49-6-10, as amended, where such nonparticipating parent supports the other parent's version as to how a child's injuries occurred, but there is clear and convincing evidence that such version is inconsistent with the medical evidence.' Per Curiam:

This abuse and neglect case is before this Court upon appeal of a final order of the Circuit Court of Mineral County entered on July 1, 2002. Pursuant to that order, the abuse and neglect petition brought against the appellee and respondent below, Amanda D.,[1] with regard to her three children, Tyler D., Alexander A., and Nevaeh D., was dismissed, and custody of the children was returned to Amanda D.[2]

In this appeal, the appellants, the West Virginia Department of Health and Human Resources (hereinafter "DHHR") and the children's guardian ad litem, contend that the circuit court erred by dismissing the abuse and neglect petition and returning custody of the children to Amanda D. They further assert that the circuit court erred by not terminating Amanda D.'s parental rights. After carefully reviewing the petition for appeal, the entire record, and the briefs and argument of counsel, we agree with the appellants. Thus, for the reasons set forth below, the final order of the circuit court is reversed, and this case is remanded to the circuit court with directions as set forth herein.

[2]As discussed herein, Thomas L., the biological father of Tyler D., and Joseph A., the biological father of Alexander A. and Nevaeh D., were also named as respondents, but the petition contained no allegations that either one abused or neglected the children. Thomas L. and Joseph A. are not parties in this appeal.

I.

FACTS

In October 2000, the DHHR began receiving reports of physical abuse and neglect of Tyler D., born on October 2, 1997, and Alexander A., born on May 15, 1999. The children were in the physical custody of their mother, Amanda D., who at that time was allegedly living with her boyfriend, Jeff W. On January 26, 2001, Amanda D. gave birth to a third child, Nevaeh D.

In February 2001, the DHHR received another referral regarding the children containing allegations of neglect and lack of supervision. In particular, it was reported that while Amanda D. was sleeping, Tyler D. dropped a box of cereal on a gas stove burner which had been left on for heating purposes and a fire ensued. It was also reported that Jeff W. had a tendency to act aggressively toward the children.

In March 2001, another referral indicated that the children were inadequately clothed, had poor housing, and lacked supervision. A month later, it was reported that Tyler D. had a burn mark on his arm from a cigarette, scratches on his stomach, a bruised eye, and a burn on his buttocks. When asked about his eye, Tyler D. said that Jeff W. had hurt him. Following another referral just a few weeks later, Tyler D. stated that Jeff W. had hit him again. This time, Tyler D. had a bruise over his left eye.

The DHHR investigated and substantiated these referrals. In April 2001, the DHHR referred Amanda D. to Action Youth Care (hereinafter "AYC") for services. A referral to a speech therapist was also made for Tyler D. Amanda D. did not keep the initial appointments made for her with AYC, but when informed by DHHR that her attendance was mandatory, she attended a June 5, 2001 meeting. At that meeting, Amanda D. reported that Jeff W. no longer lived with her. However, it was later determined that this information was not true.

Additional referrals were made to the DHHR on June 12 and 14, 2001. On June 21, 2001, the DHHR went to the family's residence to complete its investigation. At that time, Tyler D. had a small open burn or blister injury. He indicated that Jeff W. had burned him with a light. Amanda D. maintained that a lamp fell on Tyler causing the burn. Tyler also stated that Jeff W. threw him on the floor and against the walls. Amanda D. initially claimed that Jeff W. no longer lived with her and the children, but later admitted that he stayed there for the most part.

When the DHHR arrived at the home on June 21, 2001, all three children were dirty with hair stuck to their necks and smelled of a strong odor. In addition, there was an odor of urine in the boys' bedrooms. Amanda D. was unable to produce immunization records for the children and was unsure when Nevaeh D., who appeared to be sick, had last been to a doctor.

At the same time, the DHHR learned that an AYC worker had recently observed Jeff W. take Tyler D. to the back of the trailer to the shower after he soiled his pants. The child could be heard crying. After checking on Tyler D., Amanda D. reported that Jeff W. had placed Tyler D. in a cold shower. She said she turned on warm water for him.

Based on all the above, the DHHR sought emergency custody of the children on June 21, 2001. On June 27, 2001, the DHHR filed a lengthy abuse and neglect petition naming Amanda D. as a respondent. Tyler D.'s father, Thomas L., was also named as a respondent along with Joseph A., the father of Alexander A. and Nevaeh D. However, the petition contained no allegations against Thomas L. or Joseph A. At the preliminary hearing, Jeff W. was also named as a respondent.

After they were removed from the home, the children were examined by a pediatrician. Tyler D. was also examined by an ophthalmologist because of his eye injury. It was determined that Tyler D. had sustained a blood clot in his left eye which was likely caused by blunt trauma. Subsequently, Tyler D. underwent surgery to have the blood clot removed from his eye.[3]

During the adjudicatory hearing on August 17, 2001, Amanda D. stipulated to various allegations of neglect contained in the petition. She requested and was granted a post-adjudicatory improvement period. The court took no action with regard to Jeff W. although he was noted on the comprehensive treatment plan. Upon receipt of a favorable home study, the circuit court placed Tyler D. in the custody of his father, Thomas L., who was living in Kentucky. The other two children remained in foster care.

Soon after he began living with this father, Tyler D. started counseling with Hank Mayfield, a licensed psychotherapist. Amanda D. was granted extended visitation with Tyler D. The visits were to take place in Maryland at the home of David D., Tyler D.'s maternal grandfather. After one of his weekend visits at David D.'s home, Tyler D. disclosed to Mr. Mayfield that he had been sexually abused by his grandfather. Mr. Mayfield reported this disclosure to the authorities and visitation in David D.'s home was stopped immediately.

As the case progressed, Jeff W. reported that he no longer had a relationship with Amanda D. and was not living with her and the children. He filed a motion seeking to be dismissed from the case. The motion was granted on March 19, 2002, based on Jeff W.'s representations that he had ended his relationship with Amanda D. and her children.

Subsequently, the DHHR requested a disposition hearing. The DHHR recommended that Amanda D.'s parental rights be terminated. The children's case plan prepared by the DHHR stated:

> Although stipulations were presented at the August 17, 2001 adjudicatory hearing, almost three months later Cindy Hay [Amanda D.'s counselor] wrote that Amanda would like to know what she did that was neglectful. Two states, Maryland and Kentucky, have both found that Tyler was sexually abused by Amanda's father David [D.]. In order for Amanda to remedy the problem of abuse and/or neglect, she must first acknowledge that abuse and/or neglect has occurred. Amanda has not done this. In the absence of recognition by Amanda that abuse and/or neglect has occurred, the children remain at risk and it would be unsafe to return the children to their mother. For the above-stated reasons, the [DHHR] recommends that the parental rights of Amanda . . . [D.] to [her children] be terminated.

The disposition hearing was held over the course of two days. Mr. Mayfield testified regarding the sexual abuse Tyler D. reported. He indicated that once the visitations in David D.'s house were suspended, Tyler's interactions with his peers and females improved "a hundred percent." Sarah W., a cousin of Amanda D., testified that Amanda D. asked her to lie about Thomas L. by testifying that she was his mistress and that he had tried to run over her with a van. She stated that Amanda D. had also instructed her to file false criminal charges against Thomas L.[4] Sarah W. further indicated that Jeff W. was still a part of Amanda D.'s life and that she had seen him hit Tyler D. on one occasion in the presence of Amanda D. Margaret Brown, a service coordinator for the West Virginia Birth to Three Program also testified. She had assessed Alex A.'s lack of speech development. Ms. Brown testified that Alex A.'s delays were not caused by a genetic disorder, but instead were attributable to risk factors. Finally, child protective service workers from Maryland and Kentucky testified with regard to the sexual abuse reported by Tyler D. They, like Mr. Mayfield, testified that Tyler's reports of sexual abuse by his grandfather were credible.

[4]Sarah W. stated that Amanda D. was able to force her to tell these lies about Thomas L. because Amanda D. was the payee on her social security checks.

At the close of the evidence, the court found that there was no evidence to show that Amanda D. had not complied with the improvement period, nor was there any evidence to show why it was not in the best interests of the children to be returned to their mother. Consequently, the court dismissed the abuse and neglect petition and ordered the children to be returned to their mother's custody. The final order was entered on July 1, 2002, and this appeal followed.

STANDARD OF REVIEW

In Syllabus Point 1 of In the Interest of: Tiffany Marie S., 196 W.Va. 223, 470 S.E.2d 177 (1996), this Court set forth the standard of review for abuse and neglect cases:

> Although conclusions of law reached by a circuit court are subject to de novo review, when an action, such as an abuse and neglect case, is tried upon the facts without a jury, the circuit court shall make a determination based upon the evidence and shall make findings of fact and conclusions of law as to whether such child is abused or neglected. These findings shall not be set aside by a reviewing court unless clearly erroneous. A finding is clearly erroneous when, although there is evidence to support the finding, the reviewing court on the entire evidence is left with the > definite and firm conviction that a mistake has been committed. However, a reviewing court may not overturn a finding simply because it would have decided the case differently, and it must affirm a finding if the circuit court's account of the evidence is plausible in light of the record viewed in its entirety.

With this standard in mind, we now consider whether the circuit court erred in this case.

III.

DISCUSSION

A. Jurisdiction

At the outset, we must address this Court's jurisdiction in this case. Pursuant to W.Va. Code § 58-5-1 (1998), "[a] party to a civil action may appeal to the supreme court of appeals from a final judgment of any circuit court[.]" As noted above, the DHHR and the guardian ad litem are appealing from a final circuit court order, and thus, this Court has appellate jurisdiction in this case. However, shortly after the circuit court entered its July 1, 2002 final order, Amanda D. moved to Maryland with the children. Consequently, in this appeal, Amanda D. has asserted that this Court no longer has jurisdiction because she and her children are not presently residents of this State. In addition, this Court was advised on January 13, 2003, by the guardian ad litem in this case, that Tyler D., Alexander A., and Nevaeh D. are now in the legal custody of the Allegheny County Department of Social Services of the State of Maryland based on alleged abuse and neglect of the children by Amanda D. Thus, the initial issue we must resolve is whether this Court should render an opinion in this case.

When more than one state becomes involved in determining the custody of a child, the Uniform Child Custody Jurisdiction and Enforcement Act, codified at W.Va. Code §§ 48-20-101 to -404 (2001) (hereinafter "UCCJA"), applies along with the Parental Kidnapping Prevention Act, 28 U.S.C. § 1738A (1994) (hereinafter "PKPA"). In West Virginia Dept. of Health and Human Resources ex rel. Hisman v. Angela D., 203 W.Va. 335, 342, 507 S.E.2d 698, 705 (1998), this Court recognized that the definition of "custody proceeding" within the UCCJA expressly includes abuse and neglect proceedings. This Court further determined that "'the PKPA is applicable to all interstate custody proceedings affecting a prior custody award by a different State, including [abuse,] neglect and dependency proceedings.'" Id., quoting In re Van Kooten, 126 N.C.App. 764, 769, 487 S.E.2d 160, 163 (1997).

> Pursuant to W.Va. Code § 48-20-206(a) (2001):
> (a) Except as otherwise provided in section 20-204 [§ 48-20-204],[5] a court of this state may not exercise its jurisdiction under this article if, at the time of the commencement of the proceeding, a proceeding concerning the custody of the child has > been commenced in a court of another state having jurisdiction substantially in conformity with this chapter, unless the proceeding has been terminated or is stayed by the court of the other state because a court of this state is a more convenient forum under 20-207 [§ 48-20-207].[6]

(Footnotes added). However, in Syllabus Point 6 of Angela D., this Court explained that:

> "Notwithstanding their intent to require states adopting the Uniform Child Custody Jurisdiction Act to recognize custody decrees entered by sister states, the Act's drafters in no uncertain terms provided jurisdiction to both the original 'custody court' and other courts to determine whether modification of the initial custody decree is in the best interest of the child." Syl. Pt. 2, In re Brandon L.E., 183 W.Va. 113, 394 S.E.2d 515 (1990).

In this case, we believe the best interests of the children require this Court to address the merits of this appeal. Given the errors made by the circuit court in this case, we feel that we would be remiss if we did not do so. With that said, this Court recognizes that at this juncture there appears to be litigation involving these children currently ongoing in Maryland. Therefore, this Court has determined that upon remand, and pursuant to the provisions of the UCCJA, the circuit court should immediately contact the Circuit Court of Allegheny County, Maryland. Based on documents filed with this Court, the Maryland Court appears to be conducting proceedings concerning custody of these children. The Maryland Court needs to be aware of the proceedings that have occurred in West Virginia and this Court's decision as set forth herein. In this fashion, the Circuit Court of Mineral County, West

[6]This Court is unaware of any stay of the proceedings in Maryland.

Virginia, and the Circuit Court of Allegheny County, Maryland, can determine the appropriate forum for addressing the future of these children consistent with the laws of this State and the laws of the State of Maryland. While it now appears that Maryland is presently the proper forum, in the event that Maryland defers jurisdiction to this State, the circuit court should proceed to enter an order terminating Amanda D.'s parental rights, develop a permanency plan for the children, and determine whether Amanda D. should be afforded continued visitation with her children as set forth below.

B. Findings of Abuse and Neglect

Having resolved the jurisdiction issue, we now turn to the assignments of error raised by the DHHR and the guardian ad litem. They first contend that the circuit court's findings and conclusions were contrary to the evidence. In the final order, the circuit court stated:

> 6. The State of West Virginia has failed to show by clear and convincing evidence that the minor children were abused and/or neglected.
> 7. The State has also failed to show why placing T.D., A.A., and N.D. under the custody of Amanda [D.] was not in the best interests of the children.
> . . .
> 9. Allegations in petition to support termination of Amanda [D.'s] parental rights are unsubstantiated and unfounded.
> 10. The minor children herein were not abused and/or neglected by Respondent Amanda [D.]

The DHHR and the guardian ad litem firmly assert that the court's finding that there was no evidence that the children were abused and neglected is clearly erroneous given the stipulations made by Amanda D. during the adjudicatory hearing in this case. We agree.

On August 17, 2001, Amanda D. signed a document stipulating to the allegations of lack of supervision, poor living conditions, and not paying enough attention to the children. She further stipulated that there were occasions when the children were unclean and had an odor due to having no water in the home and that Tyler D.'s clothing was too small for him. Based on these stipulations, the circuit court entered an order on September 10, 2001, finding that Amanda D. neglected Tyler D., Alexander A., and Nevaeh D. However, the court's final order entered on July 1, 2002, states that there was no evidence that the children were neglected. The court clearly erred in that regard.

In addition, we believe that the circuit court erred by finding that there was no evidence that the children had been abused. Contrary to the findings of the circuit court, there was clear and convincing evidence that Tyler D. was physically abused. Specifically, there was evidence that Tyler D. was hit in the face and as a result, suffered a blood clot in his left eye which required surgery. Tyler D.'s physician indicated that Tyler's eye injury was caused by "blunt trauma." Tyler D. also reported that Jeff W. had burned him with a light and threw him on the floor.

Furthermore, there was clear and convincing evidence that Tyler D. was sexually abused. While there was no physical evidence, three witnesses testified that Tyler D's reports of sexual abuse were credible. In particular, Mr. Mayfield, Tyler's psychotherapist, testified that he believed that Tyler was telling the truth about being sexually abused based upon the language he used, the consistency in his statements, and the details he provided. Likewise, Beverly Green, a child protective services investigator with the Allegheny County Department of Social Services in Maryland, testified that the consistency in Tyler's statements about the sexual abuse indicated that he was being truthful. Finally, Glenda Razo, a case manager for child abuse and neglect in Fort Knox, Kentucky, testified that Tyler's allegations of sexual abuse were credible. All three witnesses indicated that they have considerable experience in dealing with sexually abused children. This evidence cannot simply be ignored.

Although there was no evidence that Alexander A. and Nevaeh D. were physically or sexually abused, they must be considered abused children because they resided in the home where the abuse of Tyler D. occurred. As this Court explained in Syllabus Point 2 of In re Christina L.,194 W.Va. 446, 460 S.E.2d 692 (1995):

> Where there is clear and convincing evidence that a child has suffered physical and/or sexual abuse while in the custody of his or her parent(s), guardian, or custodian, another child residing in the home when the abuse took place who is not a direct victim of the physical and/or sexual abuse but is at risk of being abused is an abused child under W.Va.Code, 49-1-3(a) (1994).

Thus, given all of the above, we find that the circuit court erred by concluding that there was no clear and convincing evidence that these children were abused and neglected.

C. Termination of Parental Rights

The DHHR and the guardian ad litem further contend that the circuit court erred by not terminating Amanda D.'s parental rights. The DHHR and the guardian ad litem acknowledge that there were no allegations that Amanda D. directly abused or injured her children. However, they assert that the evidentiary record establishes a classic case of failure to protect by a parent. In other words, they contend that Amanda D.'s refusal to acknowledge that Tyler D. was physically and sexually abused puts him and his siblings at risk for further abuse, and thus, warrants the termination of Amanda D.'s parental rights.

In Syllabus Point 3 of In re Jeffrey R.L., 190 W.Va. 24, 435 S.E.2d 162 (1993), this Court held that:

> Parental rights may be terminated where there is clear and convincing evidence that the infant child has suffered extensive physical abuse while in the custody of his or her parents, and there is no reasonable likelihood that the conditions of abuse can be substantially corrected because the perpetrator of the abuse has not been identified and the parents, even in the face of knowledge of the abuse, have taken no action to identify the abuser.

As this Court explained in Syllabus Point 3 of West Virginia Dept. of Health and Human Resources ex rel. Wright v. Doris S., 197 W.Va. 489, 475 S.E.2d 865 (1996):

> "W.Va.Code, 49-1-3(a) (1984), in part, defines an abused child to include one whose parent knowingly allows another person to commit the abuse. Under this standard, termination of parental rights is usually upheld only where the parent takes no action in the face of knowledge of the abuse or actually aids or protects the abusing parent." Syl. Pt. 3, In re Betty J.W., 179 W.Va. 605, 371 S.E.2d 326 (1988).

Moreover,

> "Termination of parental rights of a parent of an abused child is authorized under W.Va.Code, 49-6-1 to 49-6-10, as amended, where such parent contends nonparticipation in the acts giving rise to the termination petition but there is clear and convincing evidence that such nonparticipating parent knowingly took no action to prevent or stop such acts to protect the child. Furthermore, termination of parental rights of a parent of an abused child is authorized under W.Va.Code, 49-6-1 to 49-6-10, as amended, where such nonparticipating parent supports the other parent's version as to how a child's injuries occurred, but there is clear and convincing evidence that such version is inconsistent with the medical evidence." Syl. Pt. 2, In re Scottie D., 185 W.Va. 191, 406 S.E.2d 214 (1991).

Syllabus Point 5, Doris S.

In this case, Amanda D. has continuously and persistently denied that Tyler was physically and sexually abused. When speaking with her case workers, Amanda D. was adamant in her denials of abuse of Tyler D. both by her father and her boyfriend. She also denied that she neglected the children after earlier stipulating to that fact. During the disposition hearing, Amanda D. was asked whether she believed that her father, David D., had sexually abused Tyler.

She replied, "Let's not say that I do and I do not, I guess anything is possible." Amanda D. then said, "I've never had any concerns about not letting them [my children] around my father."

Amanda D. was also questioned about the allegation that Jeff W. had physically abused her children. She testified as follows:

> Q. Do you believe that Jeff [W.] was ever physically abusive to your children?
> A. No. I do not, --
> Q. Was he ever physically abusive to you?
> A. No.
> Q. Okay, are you aware, from Doctor [sic] Mayfield's testimony, that Tyler has said that Mr. [W.] was abusive to him?
> A. I believe that its [sic] possible, and, it could have happened, but I've never witnessed it.

While Amanda D. testified at the disposition hearing that she no longer had a relationship with Jeff W., she had previously made the same statement to her case workers, but then later admitted that Jeff W. still lived with her. At one point, Amanda D. asked Sarah W. to pose as Jeff W.'s girlfriend at a multidisciplinary treatment team meeting in an effort to convince the DHHR that she no longer had a relationship with Jeff W. At the disposition hearing, Sarah W. testified that she had seen Amanda D. with Jeff W. during the week before the disposition hearing.[7] Amanda D.'s false testimony and her solicitation of perjured testimony, as well as her recruitment of Sarah W. in the scheme to mislead and defraud the court regarding her relationship with Jeff W. is in and of itself compelling evidence of abuse and neglect. It was a contemptible scheme designed to obstruct and obfuscate so as to allow continued exposure of her vulnerable, helpless children to serious physical abuse at the hands of Jeff W.

Having reviewed the entire record, it is obvious to this Court that Amanda D. has never acknowledged that her children were physically and sexually abused. Although Amanda D. participated in the improvement period granted to her following the adjudicatory hearing, she continued to disbelieve her son's reports of physical abuse by Jeff W. and sexual abuse by David D. Furthermore, despite the stipulations she made at the adjudicatory hearing, Amanda D. never acknowledged that she neglected her children. Three months after she made those stipulations she was asking her counselor "what she did that was neglectful."

In Doris S., supra, 197 W.Va. at 498, 475 S.E.2d at 874, this Court explained that:

> [I]n order to remedy the abuse and/or neglect problem, the problem must first be acknowledged. Failure to acknowledge the existence of the problem, i.e., the truth of the basic allegation pertaining to the alleged abuse and neglect or the perpetrator of said abuse and neglect, results in making the problem untreatable and in making an improvement period an exercise in futility at the child's expense.

Given Amanda D.'s refusal to acknowledge that her children have been abused and neglected, we believe that there is no reasonable likelihood that the conditions of abuse and neglect can be substantially corrected. In Syllabus Point 4 of In the Matter of Jonathan P., 182 W.Va. 302, 387 S.E.2d 537 (1989), this Court held that:

> "Termination of parental rights, the most drastic remedy under the statutory provision covering the disposition of neglected children, W.Va.Code, 49-6-5 [1977] may be employed without the use of intervening less restrictive alternatives when it is found that there is no reasonable likelihood under W.Va. Code, 49-6-5(b) [1977] that conditions of neglect or abuse can be substantially corrected." Syllabus Point 2, In re R.J.M., 164 W.Va. 496, 266 S.E.2d 114 (1980).

"Although parents have substantial rights that must be protected, the primary goal in cases involving abuse and neglect, as in all family law matters, must be the health and welfare of the children." Syllabus Point 3, In re Katie S., 198 S.E.2d 79, 479 S.E.2d 589 (1996). If we were to affirm the circuit court's decision in this case, the health and welfare of Tyler D., Alexander A., and Nevaeh D. would be in serious jeopardy. Amanda D. has not demonstrated any ability or even willingness to protect her children from further abuse. Furthermore, her ability to correct the conditions of neglect in which the children were found is clearly in serious doubt. This is especially true considering the facts that have come to light since the circuit court entered its final order.

Notwithstanding this Court's findings in this opinion, to be absolutely fair to the trial judge, given the evidence available at the time of the disposition hearing, the court's initial efforts to reunite these children with Amanda D. were reasonable and fair. There is certainly a strong impetus in our law to keep families together if at all possible. At the time the trial judge returned the children to Amanda D., he could not have anticipated that Tyler D. would lose sight in his eye, nor could he have known that Amanda D. would marry Jeff W. In fact, Amanda D. had indicated that she no longer had a relationship with Jeff W., and he had been dismissed from the case based on his representations that he had ended his relationship with Amanda D. and her children. Moreover, Amanda D. did satisfy the requirements of her improvement period. Simply put, the trial judge was faced with a difficult set of facts at the conclusion of the evidence in the disposition hearing. Nevertheless, we are compelled to reverse the final order of the circuit court and remand this case with instructions to enter an order terminating the parental rights of Amanda D.

Upon remand, the circuit court is further instructed to enter a permanency plan for the children. Based upon the record, it appears to this Court that the appropriate placement for Tyler D. is with his father, Thomas L. Unfortunately, the record is unclear with regard to the appropriate placement for Alexander A. and Nevaeh D. While the case was pending below, there was an effort made to determine whether Alexander and Nevaeh could be placed with their paternal grandmother, Connie A. At Connie A.'s request, her home study was never completed, and the children remained in foster care. Upon remand, the circuit court should explore the possibility of placing Alexander A. and Nevaeh D. with Connie A.[8] [8]Documents filed in this appeal state that after the children were removed from their mother's custody in Maryland, the Allegheny Department of Social Services recommended that Alexander A. and Nevaeh D. be placed in the custody of Connie A. and that Tyler D. be placed in the custody of his father, Thomas L.

Finally, the court should also consider whether it is in the children's best interests to have continued visitation with their mother. This Court has held that:

> When parental rights are terminated due to neglect or abuse, the circuit court may nevertheless in appropriate cases consider whether continued visitation or other contact with the abusing parent is in the best interest of the child. Among other things, the circuit court should consider whether a close emotional bond has been established between parent and child and the child's wishes, if he or she is of appropriate maturity to make such request. The evidence must indicate that such visitation or continued contact would not be detrimental to the child's well being and would be in the child's best intere

Syllabus Point 5, Christina L., supra. Although there was some testimony during the disposition hearing suggesting that it would not be in the children's best interests to have continued contact with their mother, we do not believe that this evidence was fully developed. Accordingly, upon remand, the circuit court should hear argument from all parties on this issue, and take additional evidence if necessary, before determining whether continued visitation or other contact with Amanda D. is in the best interests of the children.

D. Excluded Testimony

While we have already determined that the final order in this case must be reversed, we, nonetheless, are compelled to address one final assignment of error raised by the DHHR and the guardian ad litem. The alleged error concerns the circuit court's refusal to allow Cathy Vibostak, the child protective services worker who filed the abuse and neglect petition in this case, to testify during the disposition hearing. The transcript of the disposition proceedings shows that the State, on behalf of the DHHR, attempted to call Ms. Vibostak to testify during the second day of the hearing. The State had indicated to the court earlier that it had rested its case except for presenting the testimony of Glenda Razo who was going to testify by phone from Fort Knox, Kentucky. While waiting for Ms. Razo to become available, the State attempted to call Ms. Vibostak to testify. Although Ms. Vibostak had been listed as a potential witness for the State, the court refused to allow her to testify because the State had rested its case except for Ms. Razo's testimony. Thereafter, the guardian ad litem attempted to call Ms. Vibostak to testify. Counsel on behalf of Amanda D. objected, stating that the guardian ad litem had failed to provide a witness list. The circuit court sustained the objection and Ms. Vibostak was not permitted to testify.

Pursuant to Rule 30 of the Rules for Child Abuse and Neglect Proceedings, the parties must provide a list of witnesses at least five days prior to the disposition hearing.[9] It appears that the guardian did not do so in this case. However, this Court has long since held that the best interests of the children are paramount in abuse and neglect cases. To that end,

[9]Rule 30 of the Rules of Procedure for Child Abuse and Neglect Proceedings states:

> At least five (5) judicial days prior to the disposition hearing, each party shall provide the other parties, persons entitled to notice and the opportunity to be heard, and the court a list of possible witnesses, with a brief summary of the testimony to be presented at the disposition hearing, and a list of issues of law and fact. Parties shall have a continuing obligation to update information until the time of the disposition hearing.

the children are entitled to effective representation through a guardian at litem. In Syllabus Point 3 of State ex rel. Amy M. v. Kaufman, 196 W.Va. 251, 470 S.E.2d 205 (1996), this Court explained that:

> There is a clear legislative directive that guardians ad litem and counsel for both sides be given an opportunity to advocate for their clients in child abuse or neglect proceedings. West Virginia Code § 49-6-5(a) (1995) states that the circuit court shall give both the petitioner and respondents an opportunity to be heard when proceeding to the disposition of the case. This right must be understood to mean that the circuit court may not impose unreasonable limitations upon the function of guardians ad litem in representing their clients in accord with the traditions of the adversarial fact-finding process.

While the guardian ad litem in this case should have provided a list of witnesses he intended to call to testify at the disposition hearing, we believe the circuit court imposed an unreasonable limitation upon his representation of the children in this matter by not allowing him to present Ms. Vibostak's testimony. A guardian ad litem is certainly required to comply with the Rules for Child Abuse and Neglect Proceedings, and he or she should make every effort to fulfill the role of guardian ad litem as defined by this Court in In re Jeffrey R.L., supra. However, a mere procedural technicality does not take precedence over the best interests of the children. In this instance, Ms. Vibostak was listed as a witness by the State, and thus, all parties had notice of her testimony. The circuit court clearly erred by not allowing the guardian ad litem to present Ms. Vibostak's testimony.

IV.

CONCLUSION

Accordingly, for the reasons set forth above, the final order of the Circuit Court of Mineral County entered on July 1, 2002, is reversed. This case is hereby remanded to the circuit court with directions to immediately contact the Circuit Court of Allegheny County, Maryland, to ascertain the status of the proceedings concerning the children in Maryland; to advise that court of this opinion; and to determine the proper forum for addressing the future of these children. If the Maryland court defers jurisdiction to this State, the circuit court is directed to enter an order terminating the parental rights of Amanda D. to her children, Tyler D., Alexander A., and Nevaeh D.; develop a permanency plan for the children; and determine whether Amanda D. should be afforded continued visitation with her children.

Reversed and remanded with directions.

1. "Although conclusions of law reached by a circuit court are subject to de novo review, when an action, such as an abuse and neglect case, is tried upon the facts without a jury, the circuit court shall make a determination based upon the evidence and shall make findings of fact and conclusions of law as to whether such child is abused or neglected. These findings shall not be set aside by a reviewing court unless clearly erroneous. A finding is clearly erroneous when, although there is evidence to support the finding, the reviewing court on the entire evidence is left with the definite and firm conviction that a mistake has been committed. However, a reviewing court may not overturn a finding simply because it would have decided the case differently, and it must affirm a finding if the circuit court's account of the evidence is plausible in light of the record viewed in its entirety." Per Curiam:
The Appellant, Gina Lynn S., appeals from an order of the Circuit Court of Braxton County dated September 20, 1994, terminating her custodial rights to her son, Virgil Eugene S., and granting permanent custody to the child's paternal grandmother, Virginia M. See footnote 1 The order also terminated the custodial rights of the father, Ralph M., who does not join in this appeal. Gina Lynn S. asserts that her custodial rights should not have been terminated, and that the circuit court should have granted her an improvement period prior to termination. Based on our review of the record, we agree that the circuit court erred when it denied her request for an improvement period, and we remand the case for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.

I.

Virgil Eugene S. ("Gene") is seven years old. He was a premature baby, and suffers from a host of physical problems, including mild cerebral palsy, hyperactivity, eye problems, and asthma. From the time he left the hospital as an infant, Gene has spent more time in the Braxton County home of his paternal grandmother, Virginia M., than in Charleston with his mother, Gina Lynn S. This arrangement was mutually satisfactory for several years, including a period in which the mother and grandmother informally agreed to alternate care for Gene every two weeks.

Gina Lynn S. has two other children and limited resources, so Virginia M.'s participation in Gene's upbringing helped her to provide for his special physical and medical needs. There is also evidence that early in the child's life Gina Lynn S. often entrusted him to her mother-in-law to avoid exposing him to domestic violence perpetrated by Ralph M. (Virginia M.'s adopted son), who is no longer in the home. Later, Gina Lynn S. testified that she felt some pressure to leave Gene with Virginia M. for longer visits when the grandmother represented that both she and her husband had cancer. Gina Lynn S. testified that Virginia M. seemed to want Gene near her, and that she complied because she feared the grandmother would not be alive much longer. Nevertheless, Gina Lynn S. did participate significantly as Gene's parent, having him in her home often and consenting to his extended stays with Virginia M., prior to the initiation of these proceedings.

Early in 1993, after over four years of sharing Gene's care, Virginia M. became dissatisfied. She contacted the Department of Health and Human Resources ("DHHR") for help, complaining that Gina Lynn S. allowed Gene to reside with her for extended periods of time, but did not provide financial help or Gene's Medicaid card. Virginia M. also wanted to enroll Gene in preschool, but did not have legal authority to sign papers as his parent or guardian. DHHR determined that the case did not warrant intervention, because Gina Lynn S. had properly provided for the child by placing him with his grandparents. See footnote 2 DHHR then referred Virginia M. to the county prosecutor for a possible solution to her problems.

On January 11, 1993, the Prosecuting Attorney for Braxton County filed a petition on behalf of Virginia M. alleging abuse and neglect, and requesting a grant of temporary custody under West Virginia Code 49-6-3 (1995). The Circuit Court of Braxton County granted emergency temporary custody to Virginia M. the same day.

The circuit court held a preliminary hearing on January 27, 1993, after which it granted continued custody to Virginia M., and visitation rights to Gina Lynn S. On March 17, 1993, the lower court held a hearing on a motion by the State to terminate visitation. Following that hearing, the court made a finding of neglect, See footnote 3 but did not terminate visitation. Almost a year later, on February 7, 1994, the court held a third hearing, See footnote 4 after which it granted continued custody to Virginia M., and denied Gina Lynn S.'s motion for an improvement period pursuant to West Virginia Code 49-6-2(b) (1995). The court conducted a dispositional hearing on March 11, 1994, again denied the mother's motion for an improvement period, and issued its final order on September 20, 1994.

The majority of the evidence at these hearings was testimony by Virginia M. and Gina Lynn S. The grandmother asserted that she had most of the responsibility for her grandson's care, and that she and her husband provided him with a good home. She commented on her daughter-in-law's poor housekeeping, drinking, and slovenly habits, but tempered these criticisms with remarks such as, "I think the world and all of Gina, but I don't approve of the way she takes care of the baby," and conceded that Gina could be a decent mother if given an opportunity.

For her part, Gina Lynn S. testified that she stayed with Gene day in and day out for four months in the hospital after his premature birth, and looked after his special needs by taking him to various physicians in Charleston, and to the Shriners' hospital in Kentucky. Most of the housekeeping problems, according to Gina Lynn S., were attributable to Ralph M., who was chronically unemployed, abused alcohol, and abused Gina Lynn S. Although the two were never married, they lived together "off and on" for about four years. Ralph M. has not, however, been in the household since February, 1992, approximately one year before this action was filed. Since Gene was removed from her custody, Gina Lynn S. has attended every hearing, visited Gene in Braxton County when she was able, talked with him on the phone, and brought him Christmas presents.

The most damaging evidence concerned an incident that occurred after the court's grant of custody to Virginia M. at the January 27, 1993, hearing. Dr. William Douglas Given See footnote 5 testified at the March 17, 1993, hearing on the State's motion to terminate visitation. Dr. Given had examined Gene a few days after Gene returned from a weekend visit with Gina Lynn S. on March 6th and 7th. Dr. Given found several areas of bruising consistent with being struck with an object, and also noted a "marked failure to thrive." When questioned by Dr. Given, Gene reported that his three-year-old cousin had beaten him with a "razor stroke." Dr. Given concluded that, in his opinion, the child was abused. Dr. Given based his opinion, in part, on Gene's "failure to thrive," because his weight and height were less than the 50th percentile for his age. Because Gene resided with his grandparents more than with his mother, and failure to thrive in the context of child abuse is generally considered to be the result of long-term conditions of physical and/or emotional neglect, See footnote 6 we are inclined to discount this factor as evidence of any mistreatment by Gina Lynn S. It is cause for concern, and may have indicated that there was neglect in this case. However, the record is unclear as to whether Gene's size was in any way related to his cerebral palsy or other medical problems.

In this appeal, Gina Lynn S. asserts that the circuit court erred by (1) failing to dismiss the case at the preliminary hearing for failure to present a prima facie case of abuse or neglect; (2) finding that the evidence of abuse and neglect met the "clear and convincing" standard; and (3) refusing to grant her an improvement period. See footnote 7 The guardian ad litem, on behalf of the child, requests that this Court affirm the lower court's grant of custody to Virginia M., but remand the case to the circuit court for consideration of an improvement period for Gina Lynn S., or another custodial arrangement, in order to provide for the best interests of the child in the event that Gene outlives his grandmother. See footnote 8

II.

Our standard of review in an abuse and neglect proceeding has been summarized as follows:

> Although conclusions of law reached by a circuit court are subject to de novo review, when an action, such as an abuse and neglect case, is tried upon the facts without a jury, the circuit court shall make a determination based upon the evidence and shall make findings of fact and conclusions of law as to whether such child is abused or neglected. These findings shall not be set aside by a reviewing court unless clearly erroneous. A finding is clearly erroneous when,

> although there is evidence to support the finding, the reviewing court on the entire evidence is left with the definite and firm conviction that a mistake has been committed. However, a reviewing court may not overturn a finding simply because it would have decided the case differently, and it must affirm a finding if the circuit court's account of the evidence is plausible in light of the record viewed in its entirety.

Syl. Pt. 1, In the Interest of Tiffany Marie S., ___W.Va. ___, 470 S.E.2d 177 (1996).

We address first the Appellant's assertion that the Appellees failed to present a prima facie case of abuse or neglect at the preliminary hearing. The trial court's initial ruling granting custody of Gene to his grandmother was based on West Virginia Code 49-6-3 (1995), the provision for temporary custody of an abused or neglected child. West Virginia Code 49-6-3(a) gives a court the authority to order a grant of temporary custody only "if it finds that: (1) There exists imminent danger to the physical well-being of the child, and (2) there are no reasonably available alternatives to removal of the child . . . ." In this case, no imminent danger was even alleged. The grandmother's sole complaint was that Gina Lynn S. was not providing any financial or medical contribution to Gene's care. Further, the child was already in the grandmother's custody, with his mother's permission, when the petition was filed. This made "removal of the child" unnecessary and, from the grandmother's perspective, undesirable. Thus we conclude that the trial court's initial grant of emergency custody under West Virginia Code 49-6-3 and the denial of an improvement period were clearly wrong.

West Virginia Code 49-6-1(a)(1995) provides the appropriate procedure for resolving non-emergency abuse or neglect situations:

> If the state department or a reputable person believes that a child is neglected or abused, the department or the person may present a petition setting forth the facts to the circuit court in the county in which the child resides . . . . The petition shall be verified by the oath of some credible person having knowledge of the facts. The petition shall allege specific conduct including time and place, how such conduct comes within the statutory definition of neglect or abuse with references thereto, any supportive services provided by the state department to remedy the alleged circumstances and the relief sought.

When, as in this case, the child is not in imminent danger, the court can thus consider whether the child is abused or neglected prior to a transfer of custody.

Although this case might more properly have been brought as a domestic/custody matter, it is here as an abuse and neglect proceeding and thus we will treat it as such.

II.

Gina Lynn S. twice asked the circuit court to grant her an improvement period, and both times the court refused. This Court addressed a similar situation in State ex rel. West Virginia Department of Human Services v. Cheryl M., 177 W.Va. 688, 356 S.E.2d 181 (1987). There we said, "W.Va. Code, 49-6-2(b) (1984), permits a parent to move the court for an improvement period which shall be allowed unless the court finds compelling circumstances to justify a denial." Id., Syl. Pt. 2 (emphasis added). The Court in Cheryl M. quoted with approval the following explanation:

> Clearly, the statute presumes the entitlement of a parent to an opportunity to ameliorate the conditions or circumstances upon which a child neglect or abuse proceeding is based pending final adjudication, no doubt in recognition of the fundamental right of a parent to the custody of minor children until the unfitness of the parent is proven. See, e.g., In re Willis, 157 W.Va. 225, 207 S.E.2d 129 (1973). The statute permits the court to deny such a request only upon a finding of 'compelling circumstances.'" See footnote 9

177 W.Va. at 691-92, 356 S.E.2d at 184-85 (quoting State v. Scritchfield, 167 W.Va. 683, 692-93, 280 S.E.2d 315, 321 (1981)).

The record includes one instance of alleged abuse, which produced bruises, as well as evidence that Gina Lynn S. left Gene in his grandmother's care for extensive periods of time. Though not to be taken lightly, this one incident does not constitute the "compelling circumstances" sufficient to deny the natural mother in this case any chance for rehabilitation. In fact, the court appeared to rely more on Gina Lynn S.'s abandonment of the child to his grandmother's care as evidence of her neglect. This was an agreed-upon arrangement, however, and thus did not constitute abandonment. The grandmother conceded at the preliminary hearing, the very first time the court heard evidence, that Gina Lynn S. could be a good mother if given an opportunity. The lower court should have recognized this as a situation in which a well-designed and well-implemented improvement period could provide that opportunity. We therefore conclude that the lower court erred in permanently terminating custodial rights without granting Gina Lynn S. an improvement period pursuant to West Virginia Code 49-6-2(b).

As part of the improvement period, the court on remand should order DHHS to prepare a family case plan pursuant to West Virginia Code 49-6D-3 (1995), as required by Code 49-6-2(b). The family case plan should provide detailed standards by which improvement can be measured, as well as a blueprint for DHHS to monitor, and specific information for the court to consider at disposition. See In re Carlita B., 185 W.Va. 613, 624, 408 S.E.2d 365, 376 (1991); Cheryl M., 177 W.Va. at 693, 356 S.E.2d at 186. This appears to be a case in which a child has two willing caretakers who love and care for him, and he needs them both. The improvement period should be designed to maximize the benefits of both relationships, to help Virginia M. and Gina Lynn S. cooperate in Gene's care, and to help them work together to promote the best interests of the child.

III.

This Court has said repeatedly that "matters involving the abuse and neglect of children shall take precedence over almost every other matter with which a court deals on a daily basis. . . ." In re Carlita B., 185 W.Va. 613, 625, 408 S.E.2d 365, 377 (1991). We reiterated that urgency recently in In the Interest of Tiffany Marie S., ___W.Va. ___, 470 S.E.2d 177, 184-85 (1996). This case has dragged on for over three years without ever affording the mother a formal improvement period, and without establishing any real permanency plan for Gene as required by West Virginia Code 49-6-5(a) (1995). Meanwhile, Gene has become firmly entrenched in his grandparents' household. See footnote 10 Undoubtedly there are strong emotional bonds between Gene and his grandparents. As in Cheryl M., however:

> [C]onstitutional considerations as reinforced by the [West Virginia Child Protective Services Act] mandate preservation of parental rights. It is only when bona fide attempts at counseling fail or the original abuse and neglect is so egregious that an improvement period will be of no avail that a court may be warranted in severing parental rights.

177 W.Va. at 695, 356 S.E.2d at 188. This Court's decision in Lemley v. Barr, 176 W.Va. 378, 343 S.E.2d 101 (1986) may prove instructional to the circuit court when considering this case on remand. In Lemley, we acknowledged that returning custody to a natural parent may not always be in the best interests of the child, even in the case of two relatively innocent parties. The dispute in that case was between the natural mother and the child's adoptive parents. Although we concluded that the adoption was invalid, we nevertheless held that there must be a determination of what physical custody arrangement was in the child's best interests, because the five-year-old child had spent almost his entire life with adoptive parent. Id. at 385-86, 343 S.E.2d at 109.

This does not appear to be a case in which a parent abandoned her child with no intent to return. See footnote 11 What started out as a consensual arrangement deteriorated into a custody battle on account of support issues. There must be an equitable resolution that both serves the best interests of the child and protects the rights of the natural mother and the grandmother. An important consideration the court must weigh in determining an arrangement that will serve the best interests of the child in this case is the age and health of the grandmother, and her ability to continue to care for Gene. Gene has special needs, and may need care beyond the age of majority. Reuniting him with his mother, or at least ensuring that their relationship is strengthened and sustained, would help to provide for this long-term contingency.

It would have been far better if the parties in this case had approached the challenge of Gene's custody from a humanistic perspective, rather than having their lawyers drawing the lines of battle in the sand. It is obvious that this child needs both of these people in his life. His special medical and educational needs make it difficult for his mother to care for him, and his grandmother's advanced age makes it unlikely that she can provide the permanent care that Gene may well need. The social services and the legal system in such a case should work to facilitate a relationship with both "mothers," instead of choosing an all-or-nothing custodian. The circuit court on remand should be mindful also that no matter who becomes Gene's primary custodian, he has the right to a continued relationship with both his grandmother and his mother. See Honaker v. Burnside, 182 W.Va. 448, 388 S.E.2d 322 (1989), and to continued association with his siblings, see Syl. Pt. 5, In re Christina L., 194 W.Va. 446, 460 S.E.2d 692(1995), in appropriate circumstances.

Furthermore, should it be determined that Gene should be restored to the full custody of his mother, any such significant alteration in his physical custody should be made in the form of a gradual transition to reduce any possible trauma associated with a dramatic change in custody. See, e.g., Syl. Pt. 3, James v. Maynard, 185 W.Va. 648, 408 S.E.2d 400 (1991); Honaker v. Burnside, 182 W.Va. 448, 343 S.E.2d 101 (1989). We said in Honaker:

> For the transition period to be effective in accomplishing this purpose, it should provide for ever-increasing amounts of visitation for the natural [parent] so as to lead to a natural progression to full custody. Such transition plan should give due consideration to both parties' work and home schedules and to the parameters of the child's daily school and home life, and should be developed in a manner intended to foster the emotional adjustment of these children to this change while not unduly disrupting the lives of the parties or the children.
> 182 W.Va. at 453, 388 S.E.2d at 326.

For the foregoing reasons, the judgment of the Circuit Court of Braxton County is affirmed with respect to the grant of custody and reversed with respect to the grant of an improvement period. We, therefore, remand this case for further proceedings consistent with this opinion. We direct the court on remand to order an improvement period for Gina Lynn S., to examine the needs of the child in this case, with the help of the Department of Human Services, if necessary, and to consider a plan that would result in a gradual transition of custody back to Gina Lynn S.

Reversed and Remanded.

Footnote:1 We follow our past practice in domestic and juvenile cases that involve sensitive facts, and do not use the last names of the parties. See, e.g., State ex rel. West Virginia Dep't of Human Servs. v. Cheryl M., 177 W.Va. 688, 689, 356 S.E.2d 181, 182 n.1 (1987).

Footnote: 2 It appears that this case might have more appropriately been brought as a custody matter, rather than as an abuse and neglect proceeding. See, e.g., In re Cottrill, 176 W.Va. 529, 346 S.E.2d 47 (1986). The petition alleged only that the child lived with his grandmother most of the time, that he had special medical and educational needs, and that (quoting the statutory definition of "neglected child" in W.Va. Code 49-1-3(g)(1)) "when he is in the possession of his mother . . . his physical and mental health is harmed and threatened by a present refusal, failure and inability of the said [mother] to supply said child with necessary food, clothing, shelter, supervision, medical care and education."

Footnote: 3 The court's finding of neglect was based on the testimony of Dr. Givens, discussed below. The court's order finding neglect included no findings of fact. The court found on the record, however, that Gene had sustained bruises while on a weekend visit with Gina Lynn S., that the bruises were intentionally inflicted, and that it was unlikely that the bruises had been inflicted by a child, which was Gene's explanation.

Footnote: 4 It is totally unclear from the record why the court and the lawyers let this matter languish without any resolution for this length of time.

Footnote: 5 Dr. Given is a general practitioner in Gassaway, West Virginia. He examined Gene only once, and had no continuing responsibility for his care. The record reflects that Virginia M. took Gene to the Public Health Department on March 9, 1993, because he returned with several bruises after a weekend visit with his mother. The Public Health Department nurse referred Gene to Dr. Given for an evaluation of child abuse.

Footnote: 6 See generally The Merck Manual 1964-67 (15th ed. 1987).

Footnote: 7 The Appellant also asserts that she received ineffective assistance of counsel in the lower court proceedings. Because we reverse and remand the case on other grounds, we do not reach this issue.

Footnote: 8 At the time oral argument, Virginia M. was 71 years old. Gina Lynn S. was 25. Gina Lynn testified that Virginia M. had said that both she and her husband had cancer. Virginia M. testified, however, that she was in good health.

Footnote: 9 We note that West Virginia Code 49-6-12 (1996), recently enacted by the West Virginia Legislature, now requires a parent seeking an improvement period in cases of neglect or abuse to file a written motion requesting it, and to demonstrate by clear and convincing evidence that he or she is likely to fully participate in the improvement period. Thus rather than presuming the entitlement of a parent to an improvement period, as under Cheryl M., quoted in the text above, the law now places on the parent the burden of proof regarding whether an improvement period is appropriate. We review this case, however, under the law as in effect at the time of the circuit court's decision.

Footnote: 10 Virginia M.'s husband lives with her and is approximately 65 years old. For reasons that were not explained to the Court, he is not a party to these proceedings.

Footnote: 11 This case must be distinguished from cases such as Department of Human Servs. v. La Rea Ann C.L., 175 W.Va. 330, 332 S.E.2d 632 (1985), in which a minor voluntarily gave her child up for adoption.

JUSTICE DAVIS delivered the Opinion of the Court.

1. A reviewing court must evaluate the record of an administrative agency's proceeding to determine whether there is evidence on the record as a whole to support the agency's decision. The evaluation is conducted pursuant to the administrative body's findings of fact, regardless of whether the court would have reached a different conclusion on the same set of facts.

2. In reviewing challenges to the findings and conclusions of the circuit court, we apply a two-prong deferential standard of review. We review the final order and the ultimate disposition under an abuse of discretion standard, and we review the circuit court's underlying factual findings under a clearly erroneous standard. Questions of law are subject to a de novo review.

3. Although an express grant of powers to an administrative agency will be determined to include such other powers as are necessarily or reasonably incident to the powers granted, the agency's powers should not be extended by implication beyond what may be necessary for their just and reasonable execution.

4. The West Virginia Ethics Commission has the authority to remand cases to a hearing examiner for further proceedings in accordance with the Commission's directives, regardless of whether such authority has been specified in the statutes establishing the powers and duties of the Commission.

5. """Where the language of a statute is clear and without ambiguity the plain meaning is to be accepted without resorting to the rules of interpretation." Syl. pt. 2, State v. Elder, 152 W. Davis, Justice:

In this administrative appeal, the West Virginia Ethics Commission,[(1)] appeals a memorandum opinion, issued May 17, 1996, and a final order, entered June 14, 1996, by the Circuit Court of Raleigh County, which ordered, in part, the dismissal, for procedural reasons, of Count 5 of the Commission's statement of charges against Joseph Larry Walker. Count 5 concerned Walker's knowing approval of a subordinate's falsified travel expense form. Additionally, Walker appeals from that part of the circuit court's final order affirming the Commission's prior finding that Walker had committed the ethics violations alleged in Count 3 of the Commission's statement of charges, which charged Walker with the falsification of a travel expense form. As both appeals relate to the same administrative proceedings and involve the same parties, we have consolidated these two appeals for purposes of rendering a decision therein. Upon a review of the record and the parties' arguments, and for the reasons stated below, we affirm in part and reverse in part the decision of the Circuit Court of Raleigh County and remand this case for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.

I. FACTUAL AND PROCEDURAL HISTORY

In 1992, Joseph Larry Walker [hereinafter "Walker"], was employed as a District Supervisor with the West Virginia Division of Rehabilitation Services [hereinafter "DRS"][(2)] and was headquartered in the Beckley district office. As a result of this employment, Walker was classified as a public employee[(3)] whose conduct was governed by the West Virginia Governmental Ethics Act, W. Va. Code § 6B-1-1, et seq. [hereinafter "the Ethics Act"].[(4)] The state agency charged with the enforcement of the Ethics Act is the West Virginia Ethics Commission [hereinafter "the Commission"].[(5)]

Pursuant to the Ethics Act, alleged ethics violations are brought to the Commission's attention by way of verified complaint.[(6)] Upon receiving a verified complaint, the Commission assigns an investigative panel to review the allegations.[(7)] If the Panel finds probable cause exists to believe the named employee committed the alleged ethics violations, the Commission issues a statement of charges and a notice of hearing informing the employee of the specific instances of alleged unethical behavior and scheduling a hearing for the taking of evidence therein.[(8)] Following a hearing before a hearing examiner or hearing board, the entire record and a recommended decision are tendered to the Commission which then enters a final decision.[(9)]

The events forming the basis of the instant appeal occurred in late fall, 1992, and mid-spring, 1993. Three employees who worked with Walker in the Beckley DRS district office filed a verified complaint with the Ethics Commission on March 31, 1993. Verified complaint No. 93-06 alleged:

This complaint charges Joseph Larry Walker and Thomas E. Hurley,[(10)] employees of the Division of Rehabilitation Services, Beckley District Office, with using their positions for personal gain.

Mr. Hurley, while on salary, routinely files false itineraries and charges the Agency mileage for trips he does not make. Mr. Walker approves Mr. Hurley's itineraries and expense accounts and certainly is aware of Mr. Hurley's indiscretions. Mr. Walker also is guilty of falsifying his itineraries and expense accounts.

This is a critical time for our Agency. We have exhausted our funds for case services to disabled individuals, yet these men continue to falsify expense accounts for non-existent travel and work not performed.

By letter dated April 6, 1993, the Commission notified Walker of the pending complaint and the designation of an investigative panel to assess these allegations. Following assignment of Investigative Panel "D" to review the charges and a finding by this Panel of probable cause to believe that Walker violated W. Va. Code § 6B-2-5(b)(1) (1992) (Repl. Vol. 1993),[(11)] the Commission issued a statement of charges dated October 12, 1993. This statement charge[d] that Joseph L. Walker, a Supervisor in the Beckley branch office of the Division of Rehabilitation Services, did unlawfully, knowingly and intentionally use his office for private gain as hereinafter set forth.

On November 24, 1992, from approximately 1:24 p.m. until the end of his workday, Joseph L. Walker engaged in personal business unrelated to his duties for the Division of Rehabilitation Services. He did not take annual leave or leave without compensation for this time.

Count 2

On November 25, 1992, from approximately 2:23 p.m. until the end of his workday, Joseph L. Walker engaged in personal business unrelated to his duties for the Division of Rehabilitation Services. He did not take annual leave or leave without compensation for this time.

Count 3

On or about December 1, 1992 [sic] Joseph L. Walker submitted a Travel Expense Account Settlement form which claimed expenses for a trip allegedly taken from Beckley to Hinton on November 25, 1992. Mr. Walker subsequently accepted reimbursement for the mileage claimed on that day even though he did not make such a trip.

Count 4

On or about April 6, 1993 [sic] Joseph L. Walker took a trip from Beckley, WV to Princeton, WV that was related to his state employment. Rather than return to his office in Beckley, however, he exited from the West Virginia Turnpike at the Ghent exit ramp at approximately 12:15 p.m. He did not return to the Beckley office until approximately 4:00 p.m. that day and did not take annual leave or leave without compensation for the time between 12:15 p.m. and his return to the office.

On February 10, 1994, Thomas Hurley, who, along with Walker, was charged in the verified complaint with violating certain ethics provisions, entered a conciliation agreement with the Commission. As a result of Hurley's agreement, the Commission received supplemental information suggesting grounds for charging Walker with an additional count of unethical behavior.[(12)] Counsel for the Commission moved for a continuance to permit Investigative Panel "D" to examine this information and determine the propriety of additional charges, but the hearing examiner denied the motion. As a result, a hearing was held on February 17, 1994, as previously scheduled, with respect to the four counts with which Walker was initially charged. After receiving testimony and other evidence, the hearing examiner granted Walker's motion for a directed verdict, pursuant to Rule 50 of the West Virginia Rules of Civil Procedure, and dismissed the four counts of the statement of charges. The hearing examiner tendered a recommended decision to the Commission, dated August 22, 1994, recommending dismissal of the statement of charges because "[t]he West Virginia Ethics Commission failed to prove beyond a reasonable doubt that Respondent, Joseph L. Walker, violated West Virginia Code § 6B-2-5[(b)(1)] and the allegations contained in the Statement of Charges."

The Commission, by order entered October 7, 1994, affirmed the hearing examiner's recommendation to dismiss Counts 1, 2, and 4 and dismissed the same. However, the Commission rejected the hearing examiner's recommended dismissal of Count 3 and, upon a review of the hearing testimony, concluded that Walker received reimbursement for a trip to Hinton, West Virginia, on November 25, 1992, which he did not make. In conclusion, the Commission found "the proposed decision of the Hearing Examiner to dismiss Count 3 is in error and should be remanded for further hearing."

Meanwhile, Investigative Panel "D" pursued its inquiry of the additional information garnered from Hurley's conciliation agreement and again found probable cause sufficient to believe that Walker violated W. Va. Code § 6B-2-5(b)(1).[(13)] Consequently, the Commission issued a second statement of charges. This statement, dated April 12, 1994, charge[d] that Joseph L. Walker, an employee of the West Virginia Division of Rehabilitation Services, did unlawfully, knowingly and intentionally use his office for the private gain of another as hereinafter set forth.

Count 5

On or about October 1992, Joseph L. Walker approved an Itinerary form for a subordinate, Thomas Hurley. That Itinerary form indicated that Mr. Hurley planned to take an official business trip on October 29, 1992 [sic] from Beckley to Welch, WV. Mr. Walker approved the form knowing that Mr. Hurley did not plan to take that October 29 [sic] trip. On or about the end of October 1992 [sic] Mr. Walker approved a Travel Expense Account Settlement form submitted by Mr. Hurley which sought reimbursement for expenses incurred in [sic] aforementioned trip from Beckley to Welch on October 29, 1992. Mr. Walker approved that Travel Expense Settlement form knowing Mr. Hurley did not take that trip. As a result of Mr. Walker's actions, Mr. Hurley received reimbursement for official travel he did not take.

By prior order of the Commission, entered October 7, 1994, the hearing on Count 5 was consolidated with the remand hearing on Count 3. Following the taking of evidence during the November 4, 1994, hearing, the hearing examiner submitted a recommended decision to the Commission dated March 24, 1995. In this decision, the hearing examiner opined, with respect to Count 3, that "it would be difficult for the Respondent [Walker] to be in Hinton, West Virginia, on the date and time indicated in the submitted travel documents." Finding "no evidence in this record to dispute that the Respondent [Walker] did not go to Hinton, West Virginia, on November 25, 1992, as reflected on his Itinerary and Travel Expense Account Settlement," the hearing examiner concluded that "[i]t is clear, from the evidence presented, that on November 25, 1992, the Respondent [Walker] was in Beckley, West Virginia." Accordingly, the hearing examiner found that "the record contains sufficient evidence beyond a reasonable doubt to support a material violation of West Virginia Code § 6B-2-5(b)[(1)] as contained in Count 3 of the Statement of Charges."

Likewise, with respect to Count 5, the hearing examiner noted:

Although the amount of money involved in this transaction was small, nevertheless, the conduct of the Respondent [Walker] was the type the West Virginia Ethics Act was enacted to prevent. The evidence submitted clearly shows that the Respondent [Walker] used his office as District Supervisor for the private gain of another, namely, Thomas Hurley.

Thus, the hearing examiner recommended that "[t]he record contains sufficient evidence beyond a reasonable doubt to support a material violation of West Virginia Code § 6B-2-5(b)[(1)]" with regard to Count 5 of the statement of charges. By final decision entered May 4, 1995, the Commission affirmed the hearing examiner's recommendations finding that Walker had violated the Ethics Act as charged in Counts 3 and 5.[(14)]

On June 5, 1995, Walker filed a petition for appeal in the Circuit Court of Raleigh County. The circuit court issued a memorandum opinion on May 17, 1996. With respect to Count 3, the court affirmed the Commission's decision finding that Walker had violated the Ethics Act. The circuit court determined that the Commission properly decided that the evidence submitted as to Count 3 was sufficient to overcome Walker's Rule 50 motion for a directed verdict. In the same manner, the court concluded that the investigative panel properly complied with the forty-five-day time limit contained in W. Va. Code § 6B-2-4(d) (1990) (Repl. Vol. 1993).[(15)] The court construed this provision as requiring the Panel to "proceed to consider," or commence a review of, the complaint allegations, any response, and additional evidence within forty-five days of mailing to the respondent the notice of investigation, but not mandating that the investigation be completed within this time frame.

By contrast, the circuit court rejected the Commission's finding as to Count 5 and dismissed this Count for procedural reasons. First, the court noted W. Va. Code § 6B-2-4(v) (1990) (Repl. Vol. 1993), which recites "[t]he provisions of this section shall apply to violations of this chapter occurring . . . within one year before the filing of a complaint under subsection (a) of this section[.]" In this regard, the court recognized that the events alleged in Count 5 occurred in October, 1992, and were recited in a verified complaint filed March 31, 1993; yet the investigative panel did not meet to consider adding Count 5 until March 3, 1994, and the statement of charges containing Count 5 was not filed until April 12, 1994.[(16)] Thus, the court ruled:

The record is clear that the investigative panel was not appointed as to Count [5] nor was the complaint filed as to Count [5] within one year of the violation. Respondent [the Commission] argues that the filing of the complaint on March 31, 1993, is timely as to Count [5] because it was later amended to include Count [5]. That argument would be persuasive if the original complaint put Walker on notice that he would have to defend the allegations stated in Count [5], but it did not. The first formal statement of charges as to Count [5] was filed on April 12, 1994, following the convening of a panel for that purpose on March 3, 1994.

Thus, the court determined that the Commission's decision as to Count 5 should be reversed because Count 5 was not timely filed pursuant to W. Va. Code § 6B-2-4(v). By order entered June 14, 1996, the circuit court incorporated its earlier memorandum opinion affirming the Commission's decision as to Count 3 and reversing the Commission's decision as to Count 5. It is from these rulings of the circuit court that both parties appeal to this Court.

II. DISCUSSION

Before this Court, the Commission appeals the circuit court's ruling dismissing, on procedural grounds, Count 5 of the statement of charges, which concerned Walker's knowing approval of a subordinate's falsified travel expense form. The Commission assign as error the circuit court's interpretation of the applicable statute of limitations contained in W. Va. Code § 6B-2-4(v). Walker appeals that portion of the circuit court's decision that affirms the Commission's prior finding that Walker had committed the ethics violations alleged in Count 3 of the statement of charges, which charged Walker with the falsification of a travel expense form. Walker raises the following assignments of error: (1) the Commission improperly relied upon evidence obtained illegally by an unlicensed private investigator; (2) the Commission improvidently determined the procedural course of Count 3; (3) the Commission failed to abide by the statutory time periods prescribed by W. Va. Code § 6B-2-4(d) and W. Va. Code § 6B-2-4(l); and (4) the circuit court utilized the wrong standard of review in affirming the Commission's prior order as to Count 3.[(17)] Following a brief discussion of the appropriate standard of appellate review, we will address the parties' contentions.

A. Standard of Review

In West Virginia, various administrative agencies and commissions have been established to oversee particularized areas of governmental functioning. Included within the statutory authority of these agencies is the power to hear and decide matters within an agency's specific field of expertise and to render final decisions in these disputes. See W. Va. Code §§ 29A-5-1 to -3 (1964) (Repl. Vol. 1993). See also Syl. pt. 1, Appalachian Power Co. v. Public Serv. Comm'n, 170 W. Va. 757, 296 S.E.2d 887 (1982) ("The Legislature may create an administrative agency and give it quasi-judicial powers to conduct hearings and make findings of fact without violating the separation of powers doctrine.").

Once an agency has issued an order, the aggrieved party is permitted to request judicial review of the adverse decision. W. Va. Code § 29A-5-4(a) (1964) (Repl. Vol. 1993). Upon appeal to the appropriate circuit court,

[t]he court may affirm the order or decision of the agency or remand the case for further proceedings. It shall reverse, vacate or modify the order or decision of the agency if the substantial rights of the petitioner or petitioners have been prejudiced because the administrative findings, inferences, conclusions, decision or order are:

(1) In violation of constitutional or statutory provisions; or

(2) In excess of the statutory authority or jurisdiction of the agency; or

(3) Made upon unlawful procedures; or

(4) Affected by other error of law; or

(5) Clearly wrong in view of the reliable, probative and substantial evidence on the whole record; or

(6) Arbitrary or capricious or characterized by abuse of discretion or clearly unwarranted exercise of discretion.

W. Va. Code § 29A-5-4(g) (1964) (Repl. Vol. 1993). Clarifying the extent of a circuit court's review of an agency decision, we previously have explained that:

[A] reviewing court must evaluate the record of the agency's proceeding to determine whether there is evidence on the record as a whole to support the agency's decision. The evaluation is conducted pursuant to the administrative body's findings of fact, regardless of whether the court would have reached a different conclusion on the same set of facts. Anderson v. City of Bessemer City[, N.C.], 470 U.S. 564, 57[3]-7[4], 105 S. Ct. 1504, 1511-12, 84 L. Ed. 2d 518, 528[-29] (1985).

Frank's Shoe Store v. West Virginia Human Rights Comm'n, 179 W. Va. 53, 56, 365 S.E.2d 251, 254 (1986). In this manner,

"the task of the circuit court is to determine 'whether the [agency's] decision was based on a consideration of the relevant factors and whether there has been a clear error of judgment.'" Frymier-Halloran v. Paige, 193 W. Va. 687, 695, 458 S.E.2d 780, 788 (1995) quoting Citizens to Preserve Overton Park, Inc. v. Volpe, 401 U.S. 402, 416, 91 S. Ct. 814, 824, 28 L. Ed. 2d 136, 153 (1971)[(citations omitted)]. However, these deferential standards have no application if an agency's decision is based upon a mistaken impression of the legal principles involved. Under such circumstances, the findings and conclusions of an agency will be accorded diminished respect on appeal.

West Virginia Health Care Cost Review Auth. v. Boone Mem'l Hosp., 196 W. Va. 326, 335, 472 S.E.2d 411, 420 (1996).

Following the entry of a final order by the circuit court, further appeal may be had to this Court:

Any party adversely affected by the final judgment of the circuit court under this chapter [State Administrative Procedures Act] may seek review thereof by appeal to the supreme court of appeals of this state, and jurisdiction is hereby conferred upon such court to hear and entertain such appeals upon application made therefor in the manner and within the time provided by law for civil appeals generally.

W. Va. Code § 29A-6-1 (1964) (Repl. Vol. 1993). In this regard, we have defined the scope of appellate review of a circuit court order as follows:

In reviewing challenges to the findings and conclusions of the circuit court, we apply a two-prong deferential standard of review. We review the final order and the ultimate disposition under an abuse of discretion standard, and we review the circuit court's underlying factual findings under a clearly erroneous standard. Questions of law are subject to a de novo review.

Phillips v. Fox, 193 W. Va. 657, 661, 458 S.E.2d 327, 331 (1995) (citation omitted).

Accordingly,

"[i]n reviewing the judgment of the lower court this Court does not accord special weight to the lower court's conclusions of law, and will reverse the judgment below when it is based on an incorrect conclusion of law." Syllabus Point 1, Burks v. McNeel, 164 W. Va. 654, 264 S.E.2d 651 (1980).

Syllabus, Bolton v. Bechtold, 178 W. Va. 556, 363 S.E.2d 241 (1987) (per curiam). We now apply these principles to our evaluation of the parties' contentions.

B. Issue raised by the Commission respecting Count 5 (knowing approval of subordinate's falsified travel expense form): The circuit court incorrectly interpreted the applicable statute of limitations contained in W. Va. Code § 6B-2-4(v).

The Commission argues that the circuit court erroneously interpreted the applicable statute of limitations. W. Va. Code § 6B-2-4(v) (1990) (Repl. Vol. 1993) states "[t]he provisions of this section shall apply to violations of this chapter occurring . . . within one year before the filing of a complaint under subsection (a) of this section[.]" (Emphasis added). Thus, the Commission suggests that, strictly construing the applicable statute of limitations, the circuit court's opinion that the statute of limitations had expired prior to the issuance of the second statement of charges was erroneous.

The Commission notes further that its actions complied with this statutory time frame. In the proceedings below, the verified complaint was filed on March 31, 1993, and contained information, alleging perceived transgressions involving both Walker and Hurley, which later formed the basis of Count 5. Consequently, Walker had timely notice of the Count 5 allegations involving Hurley because they were contained in the verified complaint, itself.

Walker responds that the circuit court properly found that the Commission failed to file Count 5 within the one-year statute of limitations. The court noted that "[t]he statement of charges as to Count [5] was filed on April 12, 1994," which pertained to "misconduct that occurred in the month of October, 1992." Given that the alleged violations occurred in October, 1992; that the statute of limitations requires a complaint to be filed within one year of the alleged violations; and that the statement of charges containing Count 5 was not issued until April, 1994, more than one year after the alleged violations occurred, Walker contends that the circuit court correctly determined that the Commission had not filed this charge within the applicable statute of limitations.[(18)]

With this assignment of error, we are requested to interpret the statute of limitations within which a verified complaint must be filed with respect to particular allegations of ethics violations. As set forth above, a plain reading of W. Va. Code § 6B-2-4(v) (1990) (Repl. Vol. 1993) requires a verified complaint to be filed "within one year" of the commission of the alleged ethics violation(s) to which it relates. See, e.g., Syl. pt. 3, Francis O. Day Co., Inc. v. Director, Div. of Envtl. Protection, 191 W. Va. 134, 443 S.E.2d 602 (1994) ("Where the language of a statute is clear and without ambiguity the plain meaning is to be accepted without resorting to the rules of interpretation." (Citations omitted).). We recently have reiterated that statutes of limitations should be strictly construed to preserve their intended effect: to timely provide notice that litigation has been commenced against the named individual. See Perdue v. Hess, ___ W. Va. ___, ___, ___ S.E.2d ___, ___, slip op. at 10 (No. 23745 Feb. 21, 1997) (noting that "[d]efendants have a right to rely on the certainty the statute [of limitations] provides" (citations omitted)).

In the proceedings below, Walker's co-workers filed the verified complaint on March 31, 1993, generally describing perceived transgressions by both Walker and Hurley. Following a general statement charging Walker with "using [his] position[] for personal gain," the relevant portion of the verified complaint alleges: "Mr. Hurley, while on salary, routinely files false itineraries and charges the Agency mileage for trips he does not make. Mr. Walker approves Mr. Hurley's itineraries and expense accounts and certainly is aware of Mr. Hurley's indiscretions. Mr. Walker also is guilty of falsifying his itineraries and expense accounts." The parties do not contest that this complaint sufficiently apprised Walker of the charges contained in Counts 1-4, which suggest that he failed to report for work on certain enumerated days and did not account for these absences via annual leave or leave without compensation. Nonetheless, Walker contests, and the circuit court so found, that the above-quoted statement did not place him on notice as to the charges in Count 5, alleging his knowing approval of Hurley's falsified travel expense form. Surprisingly, the dispute regarding appropriate notice and compliance with the applicable statute of limitations centers around that Count which the verified complaint more clearly alleges and establishes. The primary purpose of a statute of limitations being notice to the charged party of impending litigation, we find that Walker certainly had notice of the charges in Count 5 upon receipt of the verified complaint.

More particularly, a strict reading of the applicable statute of limitations also suggests that the Commission complied with the applicable statutory time period. As previously noted, the verified complaint in this case, which contained general allegations of unethical behavior by both Walker and Hurley, was filed on March 31, 1993. Count 5 alleged that Walker had engaged in unethical behavior in October, 1992. Pursuant to the applicable statute of limitations, conduct described in the verified complaint had to occur within the one-year period preceding the date the complaint was filed. Accordingly, conduct occurring as early as March, 1992, could have been referred to in this complaint. Thus, the October, 1992, conduct alleged in Count 5, which occurred within the twelve months immediately preceding the complaint's filing date, was well within the statute of limitations for the March 31, 1993, verified complaint. Consequently, we find that the circuit court erroneously determined that the Commission had not complied with the applicable statute of limitations in dismissing, for procedural reasons, Count 5 of the statement of charges. Therefore, we reverse that portion of the circuit court's order procedurally barring Count 5 and remand that count to the Circuit Court of Raleigh County for a decision on the merits of Walker's appeal from the Commission's ruling thereon.

C. Issues raised by Walker with respect to Count 3 (falsification of travel expense form)

1. The Commission improperly relied upon evidence obtained illegally by an unlicensed private investigator.

Walker first argues that the Commission's reliance upon the testimony of Morgan, an unlicensed private investigator employed by Walker's co-workers, mandates dismissal of Count 3. W. Va. Code § 30-18-8(a) (1994) (Supp. 1996) specifically states that "[n]o person shall engage in the private investigation business . . . without having first obtained from the secretary of state a license to conduct such business." In the same manner, employment as a private investigator, while being unlicensed so to act, is a misdemeanor punishable by a fine of up to $5,000 and a jail sentence of up to one year. W. Va. Code § 30-18-11(a) (1994) (Supp. 1996). Thus, Walker urges that "the use of illegally obtained evidence to further the goal of ethics in government is a moral oxymoron of the highest order. It is simply unseemly to use such evidence in pursuit of fostering ethical values." Accordingly, he requests this Court to dismiss all charges against him in order to manifest disapproval with the Commission's tactics.

The Commission responds that the fact that Walker's co-workers illegally obtained evidence by hiring Morgan does not support a reversal of this case. See State v. Oldaker, 172 W. Va. 258, 304 S.E.2d 843 (1983) (holding evidence unlawfully seized by a citizen, acting in a purely private capacity, is not subject to the exclusionary rule); Sutherland v. Kroger Co., 144 W. Va. 673, 110 S.E.2d 716 (1959) (ruling that constitutional protections against unreasonable searches and seizures apply only to state and federal governments and not to private individuals). Because co-workers, and not the Ethics Commission, itself, hired Morgan to follow Walker, the Commission contends that the hearing examiner's decision to permit Morgan's testimony was not in error as the evidence was obtained by private, rather than state, actors.

We note initially that, at the time of the events forming the basis of the instant appeal, W. Va. Code § 30-18-1 (1960) (Repl. Vol. 1993)[(19)] prohibited engagement in private investigations without a license:

No person . . . shall engage in the business of private detective or investigator . . . or in the business of furnishing or supplying information as to the personal character or activities of any person . . . or as to the character or kind of business and occupation of any person . . . for fee, hire, or reward . . . without having first obtained from the office of the secretary of state a license so to do[.]

Furthermore, W. Va. Code § 30-18-8 (1959) (Repl. Vol. 1993) directed:

Any person . . . who shall engage in the business of private detective as defined in section one [§ 30-18-1] without having first obtained a license as required under this article . . . shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and, upon conviction thereof, shall be fined not less than one hundred dollars nor more than one thousand dollars.

The record in the case sub judice suggests that Morgan, who was employed by Walker's co-workers to observe Walker's whereabouts in preparation for their filing of the verified complaint, was not licensed to work as a private investigator. Consequently, Walker urges this Court to reverse the hearing examiner's, Commission's, and circuit court's findings as to Count 3, claiming that without Morgan's information, the Commission would not have been able to prove that he committed the acts alleged in that Count.

Notwithstanding the disfavor with which we view the Commission's apparent reliance upon such evidence, we are unable to render a decision on the merits of this contention. Our well-established practice has required us, on many previous occasions, to decline to determine an issue raised by the parties because that issue had not been passed upon by the circuit court. See, e.g., Kronjaeger v. Buckeye Union Ins. Co., ___ W. Va. ___, ___, ___ S.E.2d ___, ___, slip op. at 34-35 (No. 23829 July 11, 1997) (declining to determine issue on appeal that had not been finally decided by circuit court); Trumka v. Clerk of Circuit Court of Mingo County, 175 W. Va. 371, 374-75, 332 S.E.2d 826, 830 (1985) (stating that "the issue was . . . not passed upon by the circuit court" and that "[t]his ordinarily forecloses our review of the issue" (citations omitted)). The case presently before us is, unhappily, one such case. A review of the circuit court's memorandum opinion indicates that, although Walker had raised the issue of the unsavory testimony of an unlicensed private investigator in his petition for appeal before the circuit court, that court did not determine or otherwise render a final ruling with respect to this matter.

Despite our inability to resolve this issue on the merits, we nevertheless wish to take this opportunity to caution the Ethics Commission upon the utilization of, and reliance upon, evidence that has been obtained by allegedly unlawful methods. The fact that we decline further review of this alleged error does not signify that we approve or in any way condone the Commission's actions in using evidence that, under certain circumstances, would constitute a criminal offense. Rather, we emphasize that the Ethics Commission, which is charged with monitoring the conduct of state employees to ensure that their behavior conforms with the West Virginia Governmental Ethics Act, should hold itself to at least as high a level of ethical behavior as the level required of those employees whose conduct it oversees.

2. The Commission improvidently determined the procedural course of Count 3.

In sum, Walker's third contention is that the Commission improvidently determined the procedural course of Count 3. In this manner, Walker complains that the Commission erroneously remanded Count 3 to the hearing examiner; the hearing examiner improperly reversed his original decision as to Count 3; and the Commission incorrectly adopted the hearing examiner's second recommended decision as to Count 3.

First, Walker states that the Commission had no power to remand Count 3 to the hearing examiner. In this regard, Walker asserts that the Commission's powers are definitely determined by statute, and, in the absence of any statutory authority to remand, the Commission exceeded the scope of its permissible authority. See Syl. pt. 3, Mountaineer Disposal Serv., Inc. v. Dyer, 156 W. Va. 766, 197 S.E.2d 111 (1973) (holding, in part, that administrative agencies "must find within the statute warrant for the exercise of any authority which they claim"). See also State Human Rights Comm'n v. Pauley, 158 W. Va. 495, 497, 212 S.E.2d 77, 78 (1975) (providing that "an administrative agency . . . can exert only such powers as those granted by the Legislature"). Walker also contends the Commission cannot claim it has an implied authority to remand because its permissible powers are very intricately described in its governing statutes.

The Commission counters that remand was proper. In the proceedings below, the Commission rejected the hearing examiner's recommendation to dismiss Count 3 because it found that certain critical pieces of evidence had not been evaluated. The Commission then remanded this Count so that Walker could present evidence on his own behalf as Count 3 had been dismissed at the close of the Commission's case-in-chief. Accordingly, the Commission replies that it had the authority, as the ultimate fact finder, to remand the case in order to assure the reviewing court that the Commission had considered all proposed findings. See Pauley, 158 W. Va. at 498, 212 S.E.2d at 78-79 (defining authority of administrative agency as including reasonable and necessary implied powers).

Second, Walker proposes that the hearing examiner erred, upon remand, by reversing his original decision as to Count 3 because no additional dispositive evidence regarding this Count was presented at the remand hearing. Walker insists that the only evidence presented as to Count 3 during the second hearing tended to support his contention that he did, in fact, travel to Hinton on November 25, 1992. Because the Commission did not present additional evidence regarding Count 3 and because the hearing examiner earlier dismissed Count 3 either because the Commission had not established a prima facie case of an ethics violation or because the Commission's evidence did not prove, beyond a reasonable doubt, that Walker had committed the acts alleged in Count 3, the hearing examiner erroneously reversed his prior dismissal of this Count. The Commission disputes Walker's contentions that the evidence was insufficient to support the hearing examiner's decision on remand.

Third, and last, Walker asserts that the Commission erred by adopting the hearing examiner's final recommendation as to Count 3. Walker argues that the hearing examiner improperly determined that "there is no evidence in this record to dispute that [Walker] did not go to Hinton, West Virginia, on November 25, 1992[.]" Rather, Walker contends that the evidence suggests that he could, in fact, have traveled to Hinton on the day in question. The Commission maintains that its decision to adopt the hearing examiner's final recommendation as to Count 3 was proper and amply supported by the record evidence.

With the presentation of these issues, the parties essentially request us to determine the extent of the Commission's authority to remand a case for redetermination by the hearing examiner and the power of the hearing examiner and the Commission to issue further decisions in the matter after it has been remanded. We have generally recognized that:

[A]n administrative agency . . . can exert only such powers as those granted by the Legislature[,] and . . . if such agency exceeds its statutory authority, its action may be nullified by a court. A further sound principle of law . . . is that an administrative agency possesses, in addition to the powers expressly conferred by statute, such powers as are reasonably and necessarily implied in the exercise of its duties in accomplishing the purposes of the act[.]

. . . .

"An administrative agency has, and should be accorded, every power which is indispensable to the powers expressly granted, that is, those powers which are necessarily, or fairly or reasonably, implied as an incident to the powers expressly granted."

Pauley, 158 W. Va. at 497-98, 212 S.E.2d at 78-79 (citations omitted) (quoting 1 Am. Jur. 2d Administrative Law § 44). Expounding upon these principles, we have held, in Syllabus point 1, in part, of Francis O. Day Co., Inc. v. West Virginia Reclamation Bd. of Review:

Administrative agencies and their executive officers are creatures of statute and delegates of the Legislature. Their power is dependent upon statutes, so that they must find within the statute warrant for the exercise of any authority which they claim. They have no general or common-law powers but only such as have been conferred upon them by law expressly or by implication.

188 W. Va. 418, 424 S.E.2d 763 (1992) (citations omitted). Despite the inescapable link between an agency's authority and the legislative statutes enumerating its powers, though, there are certain circumstances in which an agency may perform a function that is implied, but not specifically permitted, by statute. In this regard, we have stated that:

Although an express grant of powers will be determined to include such other powers as are necessarily or reasonably incident to the powers granted, the powers should not be extended by implication beyond what may be necessary for their just and reasonable execution.

Walter v. Ritchie, 156 W. Va. 98, 108, 191 S.E.2d 275, 281 (1972) (citations omitted).
In the case sub judice, the Commission's actions in deciding a case are delineated, in part, by W. Va. Code § 6B-2-4 (1990) (Repl. Vol. 1993). While no general power to remand is articulated in this provision, subsection (u) grants the Commission the authority to remand the matter for further proceedings "[i]f the commission determines that a criminal violation has not occurred[.]" W. Va. Code § 6B-2-4(u) (1990) (Repl. Vol. 1993). Thus, the Commission definitely has the power to remand within the narrow context of cases in which no criminal violation has been found.

It is well-recognized, though, that administrative agencies have a broader authority to remand matters for further proceedings before a hearing examiner, even if such authority is not specifically listed in the agency's statutory powers. This implied power to remand is necessary for the agency to render a full and complete decision on the matters which it is statutorily empowered to decide. See 2 Am. Jur. 2d Administrative Law § 375 (1994) ("An agency has the power to remand a case to a hearing officer to obtain additional evidence on specified issues, for an explanation of the reasons underlying the decision, or for further proceedings. Such a remand may be for a limited purpose, without the need to completely reopen the hearing." (Footnotes omitted).).

Given the extensive power granted to the Ethics Commission, by W. Va. Code § 6B-2-4, to commence investigations of alleged ethics violations, conduct hearings, and to render final decisions, it is apparent that the Commission has the inherent power to enter orders which may, on occasion, necessitate the remand of the case to the hearing examiner for further proceedings. In fact, the implied power of an administrative agency to remand is a necessary accompaniment to its statutory authority to make final determinations in contested matters. Accordingly, we hold the West Virginia Ethics Commission has the authority to remand cases to a hearing examiner for further proceedings in accordance with the Commission's directives, regardless of whether such authority has been specified in the statutes establishing the powers and duties of the Commission. Finding the Commission properly remanded this matter to the hearing examiner, we decline to address Walker's remaining contentions as to the propriety of the hearing examiner's ruling upon remand or the Commission's acceptance of this recommended decision.

3. The Commission failed to abide by the statutory time periods prescribed by W. Va. Code § 6B-2-4(d) and W. Va. Code § 6B-2-4(l)

Walker additionally claims that the Commission failed to comply with the forty-five-day time periods provided by W. Va. Code § 6B-2-4(d) and W. Va. Code § 6B-2-4(l). W. Va. Code § 6B-2-4(d) (1990) (Repl. Vol. 1993) requires:

Within the forty-five day period following the mailing of a notice of investigation, the investigative panel shall proceed to consider (1) the allegations raised in the complaint, (2) any timely received written response of the respondent, and (3) any other competent evidence gathered by or submitted to the commission which has a proper bearing on the issue of probable cause.

(Emphasis added). Although Walker raised this issue in the circuit court, the court refused this argument finding that "proceed to consider" is satisfied so long as the investigative panel has commenced its investigation within this time period. Walker disagrees with this characterization and contends that the investigation should be completed within this time period. See State v. Turner, 34 N.C. App. 78, 237 S.E.2d 318 (1977) (construing "proceed").

Walker argues further that the Commission failed to abide by another forty-five day requirement, namely: "[t]he final decision of the commission shall be made by the commission members who have not served as members of the investigative panel in writing within forty-five days of the receipt of the entire record of a hearing held before a hearing examiner[.]" W. Va. Code § 6B-2-4(l) (1990) (Repl. Vol. 1993) (emphasis added). See also 11A W. Va. C.S.R. § 158-3-15.5 (1993) (same). Walker represents that the hearing examiner submitted the record to the Commission, following the first hearing, on August 22, 1994. However, the Commission did not render a final decision in this matter until May 4, 1995.

The Commission replies that it did not violate either forty-five day time limit. In this regard, the Commission indicates that it satisfied the forty-five day rule that the investigative panel "proceed to consider" the complaint allegations and other evidence, as required by W. Va. Code § 6B-2-4(d). Disagreeing with Walker's interpretation of this provision, the Commission proposes that this statute requires that the investigation merely be started within this time period.

Likewise, the Commission maintains that it complied with the decisional time period mandated by W. Va. Code § 6B-2-4(l). The Ethics Commission has the authority to enact rules to clarify the legislative statutes governing the Commission. One of these rules, 11A W. Va. C.S.R. § 158-3-17.1 (1993), provides that the entire administrative record includes: the hearing transcript or recording; all exhibits introduced into evidence during the hearing; all documents filed; and "the proposed decisions and any briefs submitted by the parties." (Emphasis added). The Commission claims that it did not receive the entire record in this case until it received the transcript of the second hearing before the hearing examiner and the parties' briefs. It contends that it received the Commission's brief in support of the recommended decision on April 10, 1995, and that Walker decided not to file a brief. Because the final decision, rendered May 4, 1995, was within forty-five days of the receipt of the record in its entirety, the forty-five day rule was not violated.

At issue in this assignment of error is whether the Commission complied with the applicable time periods in its case management of Count 3. The first relevant statutory provision, W. Va. Code § 6B-2-4(d) (1990) (Repl. Vol. 1993) directs the investigative panel to "proceed to consider" the complaint allegations, the response of the respondent, and any other evidence regarding probable cause which the panel has before it, within forty-five days of the date on which the commission notifies the respondent of the pending investigation. Walker contends that the language "proceed to consider" connotes that the investigative panel conclude its investigation within the prescribed time period. With Walker's characterization of this provision, we simply cannot agree.

As we have recited so many times before,

"'[w]here the language of a statute is clear and without ambiguity the plain meaning is to be accepted without resorting to the rules of interpretation.' Syl. pt. 2, State v. Elder, 152 W. Va. 571, 165 S.E.2d 108 (1968)." Syllabus point 1, Courtney v. State Dept. of Health of West Virginia, 182 W. Va. 465, 388 S.E.2d 491 (1989).

Syl. pt. 3, Francis O. Day Co., Inc. v. Director, Div. of Envtl. Protection, 191 W. Va. 134, 443 S.E.2d 602. Upon reviewing the statutory language before us, we conclude that the language employed in W. Va. Code § 6B-2-4(d) is clear and without ambiguity. The word "proceed" is commonly used in legal parlance to signify the commencement or beginning of a particular action. See, e.g., William C. Burton, Legal Thesaurus 408, 896 (deluxe ed. 1980); Bryan A. Garner, Dictionary of Modern Legal Usage 680 (2d ed. 1995). See also 8 Oxford English Dictionary 1406-07 (1970); Random House Dictionary of the English Language 1542 (2d ed., unabridged 1987); Webster's New Collegiate Dictionary 910 (1979). In this manner, the circuit court correctly interpreted the plain meaning of "proceed to consider" when it commented that "[t]hat phrase requires the Commission to begin, but not necessarily to complete, its consideration of the complaint, the response, and the evidence available to it, within forty-five days." Therefore, because the record evidence suggests that the investigative panel did, in fact, commence its consideration of the evidence before it within forty-five days of the Commission's notice to Walker, we find that the Commission did not violate this statutory time period.

Walker also claims that the Commission failed to issue a final decision within forty-five days of receiving the entire record in violation of W. Va. Code § 6B-2-4(l) (1990) (Repl. Vol. 1993). We similarly find this contention to be without merit. W. Va. Code § 6B-2-4(k) (1990) (Repl. Vol. 1993) provides that "[t]he recording of the hearing or the transcript of testimony, as the case may be, and the exhibits, together with all papers and requests filed in the proceeding, and the proposed findings of fact of the hearing examiner and the parties, constitute the exclusive record for decision by the commission[.]"[(20)]

A review of the record in this case indicates that the Commission issued its final decision within the requisite time constraints. Pursuant to W. Va. Code § 6B-2-4(k), the exclusive record includes the hearing examiner's proposed findings of fact. In the proceedings below, the hearing examiner held a consolidated hearing as to the remand determination of Count 3 and the initial evaluation of Count 5. The hearing examiner thereafter issued a recommended decision of this hearing on March 24, 1995,[(21)] and forwarded a copy of this decision to the Commission on that same date. Within forty-five days of this mailing date, which is not necessarily the same as the date on which the Commission received this recommendation, the Commission rendered its final decision in this matter on May 4, 1995. Thus, the Commission properly complied with this provision.

4. The circuit court utilized the wrong standard of review in affirming the Commission's prior order as to Count 3.

Walker asserts finally that the circuit court erroneously concluded that Rule 50 of the West Virginia Rules of Civil Procedure, which the hearing examiner apparently believed was the basis for Walker's motion for a directed verdict during the first hearing, governed a review of the underlying proceedings because the case had previously been disposed of on Rule 50 grounds. As a result, the circuit court, analogizing the proceedings to a civil case, reviewed the Commission's findings of fact for an abuse of discretion and applied a de novo review to the Commission's conclusions of law.

Walker contends, though, that the administrative proceedings before the circuit court were not governed by the Rules of Civil Procedure, but rather by 11A W. Va. C.S.R. § 158-1-1 (1990),[(22)] which governs the Commission's administration and enforcement of the Ethics Act. See also Broomfield v. Jackson, 18 Va. App. 854, 858, 447 S.E.2d 880, 882 (1994) (stating generally that "rules of civil procedure do not apply to administrative proceedings unless the rules specifically so provide" (citations omitted)). Walker represents that the West Virginia Rules of Civil Procedure do not state that they apply to administrative proceedings. Likewise, W. Va. Code § 6B-2-4 (1990) (Repl. Vol. 1993), governing Ethics Commission proceedings, is silent as to the applicability of the Rules of Civil Procedure. Accordingly, the underlying administrative proceedings were more akin to a criminal case because the Commission was required to "find[] by evidence beyond a reasonable doubt" that the party against whom charges had been filed had committed the alleged ethics violations. W. Va. Code § 6B-2-4(q) (1990) (Repl. Vol. 1993). As such, the proper review of the case should have been the standard enunciated in Syllabus point 2, in part, of State v. Broughton, 196 W. Va. 281, 470 S.E.2d 413 (1996): "Upon a motion to direct a verdict for the defendant, the evidence is to be viewed in light most favorable to prosecution. . . . [T]he question is whether there is substantial evidence upon which a jury might justifiably find the defendant guilty beyond a reasonable doubt." (Emphasis added; citations omitted). Thus, Walker maintains that the proper standard was whether the Commission had presented "substantial evidence" to establish, beyond a reasonable doubt, that Walker had committed the ethics violations charged in Count 3.

On the other hand, the Commission suggests that the circuit court acted within the proper scope of judicial review of an administrative agency's decisions. A court may set aside an agency's findings of fact only if such findings are clearly or plainly wrong. Randolph County Bd. of Educ. v. Scalia, 182 W. Va. 289, 387 S.E.2d 524 (1989). In the same manner, a reviewing court may not reverse an agency's findings merely because the court would have decided the case differently. Frank's Shoe Store v. West Virginia Human Rights Comm'n, 179 W. Va. at 56, 365 S.E.2d at 254. The Commission asserts that the circuit court properly applied this standard in affirming the Commission's decision with respect to Count 3: the record evidence established, beyond a reasonable doubt, that Walker had committed the ethics violations contained in Count 3.

We note at the outset the well-reasoned approach to discerning the applicable standard of review proposed by Walker. Nevertheless, we find that the circuit court did not utilize the wrong standard of review in ruling upon the parties' appeals from the final decision of the Ethics Commission. As we noted in Section II.A., above, a circuit court reviewing an agency decision has the discretion to affirm the agency order or to remand the matter for further proceedings. W. Va. Code § 29A-5-4(g) (1964) (Repl. Vol. 1993). In addition, the circuit court must reverse the agency decision if the "substantial rights of the petitioner or petitioners have been prejudiced" as a result of various enumerated acts by the agency, including rendering an order that is "[c]learly wrong in view of the reliable, probative and substantial evidence on the whole record" or "[a]rbitrary or capricious or characterized by abuse of discretion or clearly unwarranted exercise of discretion." Id.

We have explained the scope of the circuit court's review of an agency decision seizing upon the "'clearly wrong'" and "'arbitrary and capricious'" standards delineated by statute. West Virginia Health Care Cost Review Auth. v. Boone Mem'l Hosp., 196 W. Va. at 334-35, 472 S.E.2d at 419-20. In employing these standards, the "reviewing court must evaluate the record of the agency's proceeding to determine whether there is evidence on the record as a whole to support the agency's decision." Frank's Shoe Store v. West Virginia Human Rights Comm'n, 179 W. Va. at 56, 365 S.E.2d at 254 (citation omitted). More simply stated, "[e]videntiary findings made at an administrative hearing should not be reversed unless they are clearly wrong." Randolph County Bd. of Educ. v. Scalia, 182 W. Va. at 292, 387 S.E.2d at 527 (citations omitted).

Turning now to the record of the circuit court proceedings in the present case, we conclude that the circuit court did not err in reviewing the Commission's final decision under an abuse of discretion/clearly erroneous/de novo standard of review as enunciated in Phillips v. Fox, 193 W. Va. 657, 458 S.E.2d 327 (1995), because the Phillips standard is analogous to the standard required by W. Va. Code § 29A-5-4(g). The circuit court enunciated that the standard by which the Commission should have reviewed the hearing examiner's second recommended decision mirrored the appellate standard of review of circuit court orders set forth by this Court in Phillips v. Fox:

In reviewing challenges to the findings and conclusions of the circuit court, we apply a two-prong deferential standard of review. We review the final order and the ultimate disposition under an abuse of discretion standard, and we review the circuit court's underlying factual findings under a clearly erroneous standard. Questions of law are subject to a de novo review.

193 W. Va. at 661, 458 S.E.2d at 331 (citation omitted). Similarly, as noted above, W. Va. Code § 29A-5-4(g) commands the circuit court, when reviewing an agency's final order, to consider whether the agency abused its discretion in rendering the decision; to ascertain whether the agency's final determination was clearly wrong given the record evidence; and to determine whether any errors of law affected the decision.

In the proceedings below, the circuit court evaluated the Commission's review of the hearing examiner's second recommended decision employing the Phillips standard. By separately evaluating the Commission's rulings as to factual findings and legal conclusions, the circuit court necessarily followed a similar approach itself in reviewing the Commission's final decision. As this method of review parallels the standard set forth in W. Va. Code § 29A-5-4(g), the circuit court employed an appropriate standard of review in evaluating the parties' contentions as to Count 3. Accordingly, we find no error in this regard.

III. CONCLUSION

For the foregoing reasons, we affirm in part and reverse in part the decision of the Circuit Court of Raleigh County and remand this case for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.

Affirmed in part, Reversed in part, and Remanded with Instructions.

1. During the administrative proceedings before the West Virginia Ethics Commission, the Ethics Commission was the complainant, and Joseph Larry Walker was the respondent. Following the administrative hearings, Walker's appeal to the Circuit Court of Raleigh County caused the parties to be titled procedurally as the petitioner (Walker) and the respondent (the Commission). Before this Court, each party has filed an appeal, rendering each party the appellant in its respective appeal; because each party also has filed a response to the opposing party's appellate brief, each party also is nominated the appellee with regard to its respective challenges. Accordingly, for ease of reference, the parties hereinafter will be referred to as "Walker" and "the Commission."

2. During oral argument before this Court, counsel for Mr. Walker indicated that Walker is no longer employed in his prior position. Walker's present employment is not relevant to the matters before this Court.

3. See W. Va. Code § 6B-1-3(h) (1989) (Repl. Vol. 1993) (defining "public employee").

4. See generally W. Va. Code § 6B-1-2 (1989) (Repl. Vol. 1993) (reciting purpose of West Virginia Governmental Ethics Act).

8. W. Va. Code § 6B-2-4(f) (1990) (Repl. Vol. 1993).

9. W. Va. Code §§ 6B-2-4(j), (l) (1990) (Repl. Vol. 1993).

10. Thomas Hurley, a subordinate of Walker, was employed as the branch office manager for the Beckley DRS district office.

11. W. Va. Code § 6B-2-5(b)(1) (1992) (Repl. Vol. 1993) states, in pertinent part: "(b) Use of public office for private gain. --- (1) A public official or public employee may not knowingly and intentionally use his or her office or the prestige of his or her office for his or her own private gain or that of another person."

12. Specifically, the conciliation agreement contained the following findings of fact implicating Walker:

4. On or about October 20, 1992, Mr. Hurley submitted an Itinerary for travel, Form WVDRS-01, which indicated that on October 29, 1992, he would spend the entire workday on a trip to the Welch Branch office.

5. Mr. Hurley's Itinerary was approved on October 26, 1992, by his Supervisor, Joseph L. Walker, even though Mr. Walker knew that Mr. Hurley did not intend to take the trip to Welch on October 29, 1992.

8. Subsequent to submitting his October, 1992, Travel Expense Account Settlement, Mr. Hurley received and cashed a check drawn on an account containing public monies for the full amount requested, including the expenses for the October 29 [sic] trip to Welch he did not take, with the knowledge and approval of his Supervisor, Joseph L. Walker.

10. The reason the trip to Welch was not taken on October 29, 1992, and Mr. Hurley claimed a reimbursement therefor was to help defray the costs of an Open House held at the Beckley office of the Division of Rehabilitation Services on October 15, 1992. The Open House at the Beckley office of the Division of Rehabilitation Services was to exhibit the newly remodeled offices as an example of compliance with the aid to Americans with Disabilities Act. Guests were by invitation and included doctors and other professionals, along with public officials. The cost of the reception was Five Hundred Sixty and 00/100 Dollars ($560.00) [sic] and there were not sufficient funds budgeted from the State of West Virginia to defray all the costs. The State of West Virginia paid Five Hundred and 00/100 Dollars ($500.00) toward the expenses. The additional Sixty and 00/100 Dollars ($60.00) of excess expenses for the cost of the reception were defrayed by Mr. Hurley and his Supervisor, Joseph L. Walker, from their personal finances. The reimbursement [of $28.60] from the trip to Welch on October 29, 1992, which was not taken [sic] was to pay back Mr. Hurley for personal funds he expended for the benefit of the Beckley office of the Division of Rehabilitation Services[.]

(Emphasis added). The record suggests that Walker approached Hurley and solicited him to contribute thirty dollars to the above-described budget shortage. Apparently, Walker further hinted to Hurley that he, Hurley, could recoup his personal contribution by submitting the fraudulent travel reimbursement forms for his non-existent trip to Welch.

13. For the applicable text of W. Va. Code § 6B-2-5(b)(1), see supra note 11.

14. For the violations contained in Count 3, the Commission sanctioned Walker by publicly reprimanding him "for accepting reimbursement for mileage claimed for a trip . . . even though he did not make such a trip"; ordering him "to cease and desist from accepting reimbursement for trips which he does not take"; requiring him "to pay to the State of West Virginia[] restitution in the amount of $13.00"; and imposing "a fine in the amount of $1,000." With respect to the violations of Count 5, the Commission sanctioned Walker by way of public reprimand ("for approving a Travel Expense Settlement form relating to a trip which he knew was not taken"); an order to cease and desist ("from approving Travel Expense Settlement Forms for trips which are not taken"); and a $500 fine.

15. W. Va. Code § 6B-2-4(d) (1990) (Repl. Vol. 1993) mandates:

Within the forty-five day period following the mailing of a notice of investigation, the investigative panel shall proceed to consider (1) the allegations raised in the complaint, (2) any timely received written response of the respondent, and (3) any other competent evidence gathered by or submitted to the commission which has a proper bearing on the issue of probable cause[.]

16. It should be noted that the circuit court erroneously stated that "[t]he Complaint that contained Counts [1] through [4] was filed in March 1993." A review of the verified complaint in this matter demonstrates that the complaint, itself, was not divided into counts. Rather, Counts 1 through 4 did not exist until Walker was charged with these violations in the statement of charges dated October 12, 1993.

17. We have reviewed the remaining assignments of error asserted by the parties and decline to address them as being without merit. In this regard, we further dismiss any error alleged with respect to the Commission's statement of charges containing Counts 1, 2, and 4 because such error, if it in fact exists, has been rendered harmless by the Commission's dismissal of these charges pursuant to Walker's motion for a directed verdict thereon.

18. In further support of his position, Walker attempts to analogize the Commission's subsequent issuance of the statement of charges containing Count 5 either to W. Va. R. Civ. P. 15, relating to the amendment of pleadings, citing Dzinglski v. Weirton Steel Corp., 191 W. Va. 278, 287, 445 S.E.2d 219, 228 (1994), or to the amendment of an indictment, given the allegedly quasi-criminal nature of ethics proceedings, citing United States v. Castellano, 610 F. Supp. 1359, 1380 (S.D.N.Y. 1985). Because we are able to resolve this issue based solely upon an interpretation of the relevant statutory language, we decline to discuss these arguments.

19. Walker asserts that W. Va. Code § 30-18-8(a) (1994) (Supp. 1996) renders unlicensed private investigation a criminal offense and that W. Va. Code § 30-18-11(a) (1994) (Supp. 1996) supplies the penalties for this misdemeanor. A review of the applicable statutory provisions, though, indicates that these statutes were not in effect at the time of the underlying proceedings. Accordingly, the statutes previously in effect, which created this crime and established the accompanying penalties, govern our resolution of this issue. See W. Va. Code § 30-18-1 (1960) (Repl. Vol. 1993) (defining crime of unlicensed private investigation); W. Va. Code § 30-18-8 (1959) (Repl. Vol. 1993) (enumerating punishments for misdemeanor offense of unlicensed private investigation).

20. The Commission alternatively suggests that reference to 11A W. Va. C.S.R. § 158-3-17 (1993) is necessary to discern the contents of the "entire record." This legislative rule more specifically designates the components of the "entire record": "The exclusive record for decision is: the transcript or recording of testimony at the hearing; exhibits introduced into evidence at the hearing; all documents filed in the proceeding, [sic] and the proposed decisions and any briefs submitted by the parties. 11A W. Va. C.S.R. § 158-3-17.1 (1993) (internal numbering omitted). However, because this regulation was adopted after the underlying proceedings had been commenced, we conclude that it does not govern our decision of this case.

21. At this juncture, we note that, under the regulations currently in effect, the decision of the hearing examiner in this case would have been untimely. See 11A W. Va. C.S.R. § 158-3-15.2 (1993) (providing that "[t]he hearing examiner has forty five [sic] (45) days from receipt of the proposed findings and conclusions from the parties to issue his or her recommended decision"). However, because this regulation was not in effect at the time of the underlying proceedings and because the parties do not raise this issue, we decline to further address this matter.

22. Upon consulting 11A W. Va. C.S.R. § 158-1-1 (1990), we have been unable to establish which particular subsection Walker relies upon for this argument. A brief review of this provision demonstrates that it governs generally the "practice and procedure" to be followed by the Ethics Commission in carrying out its statutory duties, but does not provide any specific guidance for circuit court review of the Commission's final decisions.

SYLLABUS BY THE COURT

1. "Although conclusions of law reached by a circuit court are subject to de novo review, when an action, such as an abuse and neglect case, is tried upon the facts without a jury, the circuit court shall make a determination based upon the evidence and shall make findings of fact and conclusions of law as to whether such child is abused or neglected. These findings shall not be set aside by a reviewing court unless clearly erroneous. A finding is clearly erroneous when, although there is evidence to support the finding, the reviewing court on the entire evidence is left with the definite and firm conviction that a mistake has been committed. However, a reviewing court may not overturn a finding simply because it would have decided the case differently, and it must affirm a finding if the circuit court's account of the evidence is plausible in light of the record viewed in its entirety." Per Curiam:

This matter is before this Court upon the appeal of an Adjudicatory Hearing Order of the Circuit Court of Preston County, West Virginia, entered on July 19, 2012, finding that the petitioner and respondent below, Brittany S.,[1] neglected her twin infant children, Walter G. and Joseph G., by failing to provide them with appropriate supervision on January 26-27, 2012, leading to the death of Joseph G. Following a six-day adjudicatory hearing, the circuit court concluded that the surviving twin, Walter G., is a neglected child and that it is contrary to his welfare to reside with the petitioner in her home. On appeal, the petitioner contends that the circuit court committed error in its adjudicatory finding that Walter G. was a neglected child.[2]

[1]We follow our traditional practice in child abuse and neglect matters and other cases involving sensitive facts and refer to the parties by their first names and last initials only. See State ex rel. W.Va. Dept. of Human Resources v. Yoder, 226 W.Va. 520, 522 n.1, 703 S.E.2d 292, 294 n.1 (2010); In the Interest of Tiffany Marie S., 196 W.Va. 223, 226 n.1, 470 S.E.2d 177, 180 n.1 (1996).

[2]On appeal, the petitioner also sought the immediate legal and physical custody of Walter G. and the implementation of a parenting plan between her and the child's biological father. The biological father is not a party to the instant appeal.

On April 8, 2013, pursuant to Rule 11(j) of the West Virginia Rules of Appellate Procedure, the guardian ad litem filed an update on both the status of Walter G. and the instant abuse and neglect proceeding, indicating that the petitioner successfully completed her post-adjudicatory improvement period and that Walter G. was returned to her legal and physical custody. The petitioner and the biological father also executed a parenting plan which provided for frequent and regular visitation between the minor child and his father. The abuse and neglect proceeding against the petitioner was dismissed. Therefore, the only issue before this Court is whether the circuit court erred in adjudicating Walter G. a neglected child.

I. Factual and Procedural Background

The following relevant facts, which were elicited during the course of the adjudicatory hearing in this matter, are, for the most part, not in dispute. The petitioner, Brittany S., is the biological mother of twins Joseph G. and Walter G., who were born on February 5, 2011. At all times relevant, the twins resided with the petitioner and her boyfriend, Tony A., at the petitioner's home in Preston County. Also residing in the home were the petitioner's brother, Joshua S., and his girlfriend, Brandy H.

The petitioner is a certified nursing assistant employed full time at a nursing home located approximately fifteen minutes from her home. She regularly works a 3:00 p.m. to 11:00 p.m. shift. On January 26, 2012, Tony A.'s father and sister watched the twins beginning at 2:30 p.m.[3] During the course of the afternoon, several other members of Tony A.'s family arrived at the petitioner's home, where they prepared and ate dinner and fed the twins. It is undisputed that the children spent most of the afternoon playing in the living room area, which was set off from the rest of the house by baby gates.

Tony A. arrived home from work at approximately 5:00 p.m. By 6:00 p.m., Tony A. and the twins were there alone. The petitioner testified that Tony A. always took good care of them. Tony A. testified that, other than preparing their bottles in the kitchen, he watched the twins in the living room the entire evening while he sat in a recliner and watched television. He further testified that while he fed Walter his bottle at approximately 10:30 p.m., Joseph pushed a bag of baby wipes around on the floor and, at one point, fell asleep. Tony A. testified that he did not find this to be unusual because, prior to that evening, Joseph had been falling asleep in his "bouncer." Joseph awakened and Tony A. fed him a bottle between 10:30 p.m. and 10:45 p.m. Because they had stuffy noses and some congestion, he administered .2 cc of Benadryl to each of them.[4] He then put the children to bed, each in his own crib.

[4]The twins' pediatrician, Dr. Elizabeth J. Neely, testified that they received their first set of flu shots on December 9, 2011. When they were seen on December 12, 2011, for their nine-month check-up, they were suffering from ear infections and upper respiratory symptoms and were prescribed antibiotics. She retreated their ear infections on January 18, 2012, noting they still had some coughing and nasal drainage. On January 25, 2012, two days before Joseph's death, the twins' eyes, ears and lungs were sufficiently clear to be given their second flu shot. Dr. Neely testified that congestion and cough can linger after an infection clears and that her notes indicated that Joseph continued to have a "little bit of a stuffy nose at that point" and that both children were teething. She testified that although she did not make a written notation prescribing Benadryl, she indicated that she routinely recommends it for coughs and nasal congestion. Dr. Neely further testified that "loose coughs show up at night . . . [s]o if there had been some residual loose cough it wouldn't have been inappropriate to give the Benadryl at bedtime." In addition to Benadryl, the petitioner ran a humidifier in the twins' bedroom to help alleviate their symptoms. Finally, Dr. Neely testified that she had no concerns about the quality of care the petitioner gave the twins. To the contrary, she stated they were "[v]ery well cared for[;] [v]ery happy[;] [v]ery happy children" and that the petitioner was fully involved in their treatment and care.

When the petitioner arrived home at 11:15 p.m., the twins were already asleep. The petitioner testified that she sat in the living room and asked Tony about the boys. According to the petitioner, "nothing he told me was unusual for that night." Although Tony mentioned to her that Joseph had fallen asleep on the floor, the petitioner testified that she did not find it to be unusual because the twins had previously begun to fall asleep on their own. It is undisputed that the petitioner did not check on the twins before she and Tony went to bed at approximately 11:30 p.m.[5] The petitioner testified that if the children were already asleep in their cribs when she arrived home from work, she usually did not enter their bedroom to check on them because if one of them were to awaken, it would cause the other one to awaken, too.

The following morning, Walter awakened between 9:00 a.m. and 9:15 a.m., at which time Tony A. took him out of his crib. When the petitioner went into the twins' room to then check on Joseph, she saw that his face was blue and his body was stiff. When the petitioner screamed for help, someone in the home called 911; the petitioner's mother, Kathy S., was also called because she is a nurse and lives just across the field from the petitioner's home. Kathy S. attempted to revive Joseph until emergency medical personnel arrived; however, he was already dead.

[5]Joshua S., the petitioner's brother, and Brandy H., his girlfriend, who had gone out for the evening, arrived home shortly thereafter. They also went to bed at approximately 11:30 p.m.

According to the testimony of Dawn Spears, Preston County Medical Examiner/Coroner, who arrived at the petitioner's home the morning of Joseph's death after being notified by Preston County 911, she observed vomit on the bedding in Joseph's crib. In an Unexplained Infant/Early Childhood Death Investigation Report prepared by Ms. Spears in connection with her investigation of Joseph's death, she reported that the vomit contained two pieces of what appeared to be "black vinyl" matching the material of the sofa in the living room of the home.[6]

Approximately one month later, toxicology tests determined that Joseph's cause of death was the ingestion of buprenorphine,[7] also known by the proprietary name of [6]The petitioner had a black imitation leather sofa in her living room, which was given to her and Tony A. by his father. The petitioner testified that the sofa had rips in it when they got it and that, over time, the rips had gotten larger from use and that pieces of the sofa would sometimes fall to the ground. Both she and Tony testified that the twins would sometimes put things in their mouths that they picked up off the floor. The petitioner further testified that she tried to keep the sofa covered in blankets to keep the twins from picking at it.

[7]Buprenorphine is available in sublingual dissolvable pill form, which is orange in color and, according to Dr. Hamada Mahmoud, Deputy Chief Medical Examiner in the West Virginia Office of the Chief Medical Examiner, a child could easily mistake it for candy. Buprenorphine is also available in a transdermal patch, as an injection (for children), and in the form of a film which dissolves on the tongue. Dr. James Kraner, Chief Toxicologist inthe Chief Medical Examiner's office, testified that it was difficult to determine how much of the drug the child ingested but that a single two milligram tablet could have produced the level found in Joseph's body upon death.

Suboxone, with diphenhydramine (Benadryl) adding to its adverse effects.[8] Buprenorphine is an opiate derivative prescribed to treat drug addiction and is sometimes prescribed for pain. It is also known to be abused as a street drug. Dr. Hamada Mahmoud, Deputy Chief Medical Examiner of the West Virginia Office of the Chief Medical Examiner, testified that the time of Joseph's death was estimated at approximately 7:00 a.m. on January 27, 2012, with ingestion of the buprenorphine occurring between 6:00 p.m. and midnight the previous evening.

It is undisputed that neither Joseph nor Walter had a prescription for buprenorphine. It is further undisputed that the petitioner did not have a prescription for this drug nor was there any evidence that she ever abused it or any other prescription drug. After the toxicology report was issued, the petitioner underwent a court-ordered drug screen, which was negative for buprenorphine as well as for all of the other substances for which she was screened. According to Tina Krentz, the petitioner's supervisor at the nursing home where she worked, the petitioner's mandatory pre-employment drug screen was negative.[9] [8]Dr. Kraner testified that although diphenhydramine (Benadryl) is an accepted medication for children of Joseph's age, it had an adverse additive effect in this case when ingested with the buprenorphine, causing Joseph to stop breathing.

[9]The petitioner began employment at the nursing home on May 4, 2011. Ms. Krentz testified that additional drug testing is conducted on employees only when there is a suspicion that there is a substance abuse problem. She further testified that the petitioner has never been required to undergo additional drug testing. According to Ms. Krentz's testimony, the petitioner does not have access to drugs at the nursing home and (continued...)

The petitioner testified that she was shocked to learn that Joseph's cause of death was the lethal ingestion of buprenorphine. She further testified that she did not know anyone who used the drug and had no information as to how the drug would have been accessible to her children. It is undisputed that she was very cooperative with the police and Child Protective Services ("CPS") investigations into Joseph's death. According to CPS worker Lawrence Taylor, CPS had no prior referrals or reports involving the petitioner or her family. Mr. Taylor testified that there was no indication that the petitioner has a drug problem and that, in this case, the department was exclusively concerned with where the buprenorphine originated and that it "could . . . have something to do with the caretakers" of the twins.

Furthermore, there was no evidence that any of the other people then living in the petitioner's home–Tony A., Joshua S. (the petitioner's brother) and Brandy H.[10] (Joshua's girlfriend)–had a prescription for buprenorphine or otherwise abused it. Similarly, there was no evidence that any of the other people at the petitioner's home on the day preceding Joseph's G.'s death were either using or abusing buprenorphine or any other drug.

buprenorphine is not used by any of the residents there. Ms. Krentz indicated that the petitioner is an excellent employee who is well liked by the nursing home residents.

[10]Like the petitioner, Brandy H. was a certified nursing assistant and was employed at the same nursing home where the petitioner worked. Her employment supervisor, Ms. Krentz, testified that Brandy's pre-employment drug screen was negative. Ms. Krentz further testified that she had never seen Brandy under the influence of drugs.

During the course of the investigation,[11] it was learned that, one to two years prior to Joseph's death, Tina C., Tony A.'s sister who, along with Tony A.'s father, babysat the twins the day before Joseph's death, had a prescription for Suboxone. However, she told investigators that she had stopped taking it because it made her ill.[12] The petitioner testified that she was unaware that Tina C. ever had a prescription for Suboxone and was further unaware of the reasons for which it was prescribed until after the toxicology report in this matter was disclosed. Ultimately, neither the investigations by law enforcement and CPS nor the petitioner's own inquiries into Joseph's death were able to determine how Joseph ingested the drug or where it originated.

On February 28, 2012, the West Virginia Department of Health and Human Resources ("DHHR") filed an Imminent Danger Petition pursuant to West Virginia Code § 49-6-1, et seq., alleging that Walter G. was a "neglected and/or abused child" based upon the death of Joseph G. resulting from a "lethal ingestion of Suboxone." The circuit court ordered immediate transfer of the legal and physical custody of the child to the DHHR pending a preliminary hearing. Walter G. was placed with his maternal grandparents. On March 7, [11]It is undisputed that everyone who was present at the petitioner's home on January 26, 2012, was very cooperative with the police and CPS investigations into Joseph's death.

[12]Tina C. was prescribed Suboxone after she had attempted suicide. She was prescribed the drug in the dissolvable strip form. There is no evidence that Tina C. had a prescription for Suboxone at the time of Joseph's death, or that she was otherwise illegally abusing the drug.

2012, the petitioner waived her right to a preliminary hearing and the circuit court found that the best interests of Walter G. would be served by remaining in the temporary custody of the DHHR with continued placement in the home of the maternal grandparents. The petitioner was granted liberal visitation. It is noted that during the pendency of the abuse and neglect proceedings against the petitioner, Tony A., Joshua S., and Brandy H. all moved out of the petitioner's home.

At a hearing conducted on April 27, 2012, the circuit court denied the petitioner's motion for a three-month pre-adjudicatory improvement period. As previously indicated, adjudicatory proceedings were conducted over a course of six days during which the facts set forth above were elicited.[13] In an Adjudicatory Hearing Order entered July 19, 2012, the circuit court found that the petitioner "neglected her twin infant children, including Walter [G.], by failing to provide them with appropriate supervision on January 26-27, 2012, leading to the death of Joseph [G.], and posing an imminent danger to the health and/or well-being of his surviving twin, Walter [G.]." The circuit court concluded that the death of [13]During the course of the adjudicatory proceedings, the prosecuting attorney moved to withdraw as counsel for the DHHR based upon his belief that there was not enough evidence to go forward. The prosecuting attorney's position was in conflict with that of his client, the DHHR, which sought to pursue the matter. Ultimately, the circuit court denied the motion to withdraw and ordered the prosecuting attorney to continue to represent the DHHR pursuant to In re Ashton M., 228 W.Va. 584, 723 S.E.2d 409 (2012) (holding that in civil abuse and neglect proceedings, DHHR is client of county prosecutors and prosecutor had duty to represent DHHR's recommendation of termination of custodial and parental rights).

Joseph G. "was a result of a non-accidental oral ingestion of buprenorphine (Suboxone) as combined with diphenhydramine (Benadryl)" and that > the failure of the [petitioner] or anyone to check on the children[14] and the [petitioner's] failure to have a responsible caregiver constitutes neglect to provide appropriate supervision when taken in the context of the uncontroverted testimony that the children were ill, had just received their second flu shot the day before, were being administered Benadryl, and that Joseph had fallen asleep while playing, which was an unusual event for him. The Court also notes and FINDS that the presence of black material in Joseph's vomit is believed by the parties to have been from the peeling, cracked naugahyde couch in the living room, supports the conclusion that inadequate supervision was provided on January 26, 2012, because the parties conceded, in all probability, that Joseph consumed pieces of the naugahyde while being watched by [Tony A.]. The Court further FINDS the death of Joseph unexplained, but according to the medical examiner, due to the oral ingestion of buprenorphine, which was accessible to the children on January 26, 2012.

(footnote added). It is from this order that the petitioner now appeals.

II. Standard of Review

This Court has stated that "'[f]or appeals resulting from abuse and neglect proceedings, such as the case sub judice, we employ a compound standard of review: conclusions of law are subject to a de novo review, while findings of fact are weighed against

[14]The circuit court emphasized that after Tony gave the twins Benadryl and put them to bed, "he did not check on them for the remainder of the night." The circuit court further emphasized that the petitioner "returned home from work at approximately 11:15 p.m., but she testified that she did not check on the twins until awakened by the surviving twin, Walter, at approximately 9:30 a.m. the next morning."

a clearly erroneous standard.' In re Emily, 208 W.Va. 325, 332, 540 S.E.2d 542, 549 (2000)." In re Gordon G., 216 W.Va. 33, 36, 602 S.E.2d 476, 479 (2004). Additionally, in syllabus point one of In the Interest of: Tiffany Marie S., 196 W.Va. 223, 225-26, 470 S.E.2d 177, 179-80 (1996), this Court held the following:

> Although conclusions of law reached by a circuit court are subject to de novo review, when an action, such as an abuse and neglect case, is tried upon the facts without a jury, the circuit court shall make a determination based upon the evidence and shall make findings of fact and conclusions of law as to whether such child is abused or neglected. These findings shall not be set aside by a reviewing court unless clearly erroneous. A finding is clearly erroneous when, although there is evidence to support the finding, the reviewing court on the entire evidence is left with the definite and firm conviction that a mistake has been committed. However, a reviewing court may not overturn a finding simply because it would have decided the case differently, and it must affirm a finding if the circuit court's account of the evidence is plausible in light of the record viewed in its entirety.

See Gordon G., 216 W.Va. at 36, 602 S.E.2d at 479. We now apply this standard of review to the case sub judice.

III. Discussion

A. Non-Accidental Ingestion

At the outset, we address the circuit court's conclusion that Joseph's death "was a result of a non-accidental oral ingestion of buprenorphine (Suboxone) as combined with diphenhydramine (Benadryl)." (Emphasis added). We find this conclusion–which clearly suggests that Joseph's ingestion of the drug was intentional–to be contrary to the evidence. In fact, there was no evidence whatsoever presented below that even remotely suggested that the ingestion was intentional. Moreover, during oral argument, the DHHR conceded that the facts herein do not support such a conclusion and surmised that, in all likelihood, the circuit court mistakenly included this finding in its order. Be that as it may, we are mindful that "[i]t is a paramount principle of jurisprudence that a court speaks only through its orders." Legg v. Felinton, 219 W.Va. 478, 483, 637 S.E.2d 576, 581 (2006). See State v. White, 188 W.Va. 534, 536 n.2, 425 S.E.2d 210, 212 n.2 (1992) ("[H]aving held that a court speaks through its orders, we are left to decide this case within the parameters of the circuit court's order." (citations omitted)); State ex rel. Erlewine v. Thompson, 156 W.Va. 714, 718, 207 S.E.2d 105, 107 (1973) ("A court of record speaks only through its orders[.]" (citations omitted)). Accordingly, this Court concludes that, given the facts of this case, the circuit court clearly erred in its conclusion that Joseph's death was caused by a non-accidental ingestion of buprenorphine.

B. Appropriate Supervision

Next, we address the primary issue in this appeal: Whether the circuit court clearly erred in concluding that the petitioner neglected her children, including Walter G., by failing to provide appropriate supervision on January 26-27, 2012.

West Virginia Code § 49-1-3(11)(A) (2009) (Supp. 2012) defines a "neglected child" as a child:

> (i) Whose physical or mental health is harmed or threatened by a present refusal, failure or inability of the child's parent, guardian or custodian to supply the child with necessary food, clothing, shelter, supervision, medical care or education, when such refusal, failure or inability is not due primarily to a lack of financial means on the part of the parent, guardian or custodian; or
> (ii) Who is presently without necessary food, clothing, shelter, medical care, education or supervision because of the disappearance or absence of the child's parent or custodian[.]

The petitioner argues that the circuit court's factual findings do not support its conclusion that she neglected her children on January 26-27, 2012, by failing to have a responsible caregiver for them and by failing to check on them after she returned home from work. The petitioner further contends that her conduct did not constitute a lack of proper supervision which warranted a finding that Walter G. is a "neglected child" as that term is defined by West Virginia Code § 49-1-3(11)(A). However, the DHHR and the guardian ad litem contend that the circuit court did not err in finding that Walter G. was a neglected child by virtue of the petitioner's failure to supervise. At issue, therefore, is whether there was sufficient proof leading to the circuit court's conclusion that the petitioner neglected her child, Walter G.

This Court has previously held as follows:

> "W.Va. Code, 49-6-2(c) [1980], requires the State Department of Welfare [now the Department of Health and Human Resources], in a child abuse or neglect case, to prove 'conditions existing at the time of the filing of the petition . . . by clear and convincing proof.'" Syllabus point 1, [in part], In the Interest of S.C., 168 W.Va. 366, 284 S.E.2d 867 (1981).

Syl. Pt. 2, in part, In re Bryanna H., 225 W.Va. 659, 661, 695 S.E.2d 889, 891 (2010). As indicated above, the circuit court concluded, in relevant part, that

> [t]he failure of the [petitioner] or anyone to check on the children and the [petitioner's] failure to have a responsible caregiver constitutes neglect to provide appropriate supervision when taken in the context of the uncontroverted testimony that the children were ill, had just received their second flu shot the day before, were being administered Benadryl, and that Joseph had fallen asleep while playing, which was an unusual event for him.

Based upon our appellate review of all of the evidence, this Court is of the opinion that the circuit court's adjudicatory finding of neglect was not based upon clear and convincing evidence and was, therefore, clearly erroneous. See Tiffany Marie S., 196 W.Va. at 225-26, 470 S.E.2d at 179-80, syl. pt. 1. The adjudicatory hearing transcript indicates that, contrary to the circuit court's conclusion that it was "an unusual event" for Joseph to have fallen asleep on the floor, both the petitioner and Tony A. testified that, in fact, they were not concerned because the boys had previously begun falling asleep on their own. The petitioner specifically testified that "nothing [Tony] told me was unusual for that night." Furthermore, although the children had previously been ill, Dr. Neely testified that their eyes, ears, and lungs were sufficiently clear to be able to receive their flu shots on January 25, 2012. There was no evidence that the shots caused the twins to suffer any ill effects or that their lingering coughs and stuffy noses were of particular concern.

The evidence further established that, prior to and including the date of Joseph's death, the petitioner was an attentive mother who was fully committed to the welfare of her children. The twins' pediatrician, Dr. Neely, testified that the petitioner brought them in for regular medical check-ups and vaccinations and sought medical attention for them when they were ill. In her objective opinion, the petitioner was a very involved mother and that the children appeared to be happy and well cared for.[15]

Additional evidence adduced during the adjudicatory proceedings demonstrated that Tony A. routinely watched the children after he arrived home from work at 5:00 p.m. and that, prior to Joseph's death, the petitioner had no reason to believe that he was not an appropriate caregiver. Indeed, she testified that he always took good care of the children. Importantly, the DHHR offered no evidence to the contrary.

[15]Furthermore, the petitioner's supervisor at the nursing home where the petitioner is employed testified that she is an excellent employee who is well liked by the residents.

With regard to the hours preceding Joseph's death, the evidence showed that on January 26, 2012, after everyone left the home at approximately 6:00 p.m., Tony A. attended to the twins in the living room the entire evening. He admitted to leaving them alone briefly to make their bottles in the kitchen. He testified that he fed Joseph a bottle between 10:30 p.m. and 10:45 p.m. He also administered Benadryl to each child in the appropriate dosage for treatment of their lingering stuffy noses and congestion. Tony A. put the twins to bed and they were asleep before the petitioner arrived home from work shortly thereafter, at approximately 11:15 p.m.

When the petitioner arrived home from work, she asked Tony A. about the boys and, as indicated above, he told her that nothing unusual had occurred. Although she did not check on the twins before going to bed at 11:30 p.m. (less than one hour after Tony A. had placed them in their cribs), there is no medical evidence that if she had checked on Joseph, that it would have prevented his death, which, according to expert medical testimony, did not occur until approximately 7:00 a.m. the following morning. The petitioner testified that, as a matter of course, if the twins were already asleep in their cribs when she arrived home from work, she did not enter their bedroom to check on them because if one of them were to awaken, it would cause the other one to awaken, too.

This Court is mindful that Joseph's death was caused by the lethal ingestion of a narcotic, the source of which has never been uncovered. There was no evidence, however, that either the petitioner or Tony A. used or had access to buprenorphine or that the petitioner had reason to believe that anyone living in or visiting her home on January 26, 2012, was either using or abusing it.[16] Investigations by police and CPS, and the petitioner's own inquiries into where the drug originated and how Joseph was able to ingest it, were unsuccessful. It is clear, therefore, that the petitioner could not have foreseen that her children would either have access to or accidentally ingest buprenorphine while under Tony A.'s care or at anytime.

In consideration of all of the above, this Court finds that the circuit court clearly erred in concluding that Walter G. was a neglected child. In so holding, we are cognizant that "[a]lthough parents have substantial rights that must be protected, the primary goal in cases involving abuse and neglect . . . must be the health and welfare of the children." Syl. Pt. 3, In re Katie S., 198 W.Va. 79, 82, 479 S.E.2d 589, 592 (1996). Indeed, "'[t]he best interests of the child is the polar star by which decisions must be made which affect children.' Michael K.T. v. Tina L.T., 182 W.Va. 399, 405, 387 S.E.2d 866, 872 (1989)

[16]As previously established, the petitioner learned after the toxicology report was disclosed that Tina C., Tony A.'s sister, had been prescribed Suboxone one to two years earlier. According to the police investigation and the petitioner's own inquiries, Tina C. stopped taking the medication because it made her ill. There was no evidence that Tina C. was using buprenorphine at the time of Joseph's death.

(citation omitted)." In re Isaiah A., 228 W.Va. 176, 182, 718 S.E.2d 775, 781 (2010). See In re Amber Leigh J., 216 W.Va. 266, 272, 607 S.E.2d 372, 378 (2004) ("Of course, [in abuse and neglect cases] the best interests of the child are paramount." (internal quotations and citation omitted)). In this case, the circuit court, the DHHR, and the guardian ad litem clearly endeavored to protect the health, safety, and welfare of Walter G. following the death of his brother, Joseph G., by instituting the instant proceedings. In removing Walter from the home and granting the petitioner an improvement period, the circuit court was then able to evaluate the petitioner's fitness as a parent. Ultimately, the circuit court correctly reunified Walter with his mother and dismissed the abuse and neglect proceedings against her. However, in reviewing the entire record on appeal, this Court concludes that there was no clear and convincing evidence to support the circuit court's adjudicatory finding of neglect in the first instance.[17]

[17]Finally, we note that the Adjudicatory Hearing Order refers to In re Jeffrey R.L., 190 W.Va. 24, 435 S.E.2d 162 (1993), and several of its progeny, which held that parental rights may be terminated where there is clear and convincing evidence of physical abuse of a child while in the custody of a parent and where it is unlikely the conditions of abuse can be corrected "because the perpetrator of the abuse has not been identified and the parents, even in the face of knowledge of the abuse, have taken no action to identify the abuser." 190 W.Va. at 25-26, 435 S.E.2d at 163-64, syl. pt. 3, in part. See also In re Kaitlyn P., 225 W.Va. 123, 127, 690 S.E.2d 131, 135 (2010); Syl. Pt. 2, In re Danielle T., 195 W.Va. 530-31, 466 S.E.2d 189-90 (1995). Our review of the circuit court's order clearly indicates that the court referred to these cases only to the extent that the DHHR relied on them in support of its position below and that its finding of neglect was not based upon the failure to identify the source of the buprenorphine.

IV. Conclusion

For the reasons stated herein, the Adjudicatory Hearing Order entered July 19, 2012, is hereby reversed.

Reversed.

2. "Although parents have substantial rights that must be protected, the primary goal in cases involving abuse and neglect, as in all family law matters, must be the health and welfare of the children." Syl. pt. 3, In re Katie S., 198 W. Va. 79, 479 S.E.2d 589 (1996).

3. "When parental rights are terminated due to neglect or abuse, the circuit court may nevertheless in appropriate cases consider whether continued visitation or other contact with the abusing parent is in the best interest of the child. Among other things, the circuit court should consider whether a close emotional bond has been established between parent and child and the child's wishes, if he or she is of appropriate maturity to make such request. The evidence must indicate that such visitation or continued contact would not be detrimental to the child's well being and would be in the child's best interest." Guardian Ad Litem

Per Curiam:
This case is before this Court upon an appeal from the final decision of the Circuit Court of Marshall County, West Virginia, entered on June 25, 1996. This case concerns the improvement period granted to the appellant, Evelyn R., following an adjudication that she had abused and neglected her two minor children, William John R. and Dana R. See footnote 1 Pursuant to the final order, the circuit court terminated the improvement period and granted permanent guardianship of the children to the West Virginia Department of Health and Human Resources (hereinafter "Department").

This Court has before it the petition for appeal, all matters of record and the briefs and argument of counsel. Upon a careful consideration of the record, and for the reasons stated below, this Court holds that the circuit court acted within its discretion in terminating the improvement period and granting permanent guardianship of the children to the Department. Moreover, based upon the representation of counsel to this Court concerning the commitment of the Kanawha County foster parents to the children, we further hold that William John R. and Dana R. be permanently placed in that foster home, i.e., the home of Mr. and Mrs. M., where the children have resided since 1994, subject to the periodic monitoring by the Department as required by law. In addition, however, this Court remands this case to the circuit court upon the question of visitation between the appellant and the children.

I.

The appellant is the natural mother of William John R., born on February 26, 1988, and Dana R., born on September 12, 1989. The appellant, the children and her husband Sidney L., Sr., lived in Moundsville, West Virginia. The appellant's step-child, Sidney L., Jr., the son of Sidney L., Sr., also lived in the home.

Both William John R. and Dana R. are "special needs children." Both children are mildly mentally retarded or impaired. Moreover, William John R. has been diagnosed with attention deficit/hyperactivity disorder. Dana R., on the other hand, has been diagnosed with post-traumatic disorder symptoms (arising from a history of child abuse) and behavioral problems. Consequently, as the record indicates, both children are in need of continuing, specialized care. Unfortunately, the appellant also suffers from significant mental problems, including mild mental retardation, various personality disorders, depression and anxiety.

On February 17, 1994, following the monitoring of the family for some period of time, the Department filed a petition in the circuit court alleging that the appellant and her husband had abused and neglected William John R., Dana R. and Sidney L., Jr. W. Va. Code, 49-6-1 [1992]. Upon review, the circuit court granted temporary custody of the children to the Department, appointed counsel for the appellant and her husband and appointed a guardian ad litem to represent the children. Soon after, the appellant and her husband separated, and divorce proceedings were instituted. As a result, Sidney L., Jr., was allowed to remain with his father, and they were, ultimately, dismissed from the proceedings. See footnote 2

In March 1994, the circuit court granted the appellant a pre-adjudicatory improvement period and supervised visitation with William John R. and Dana R. At that time, the two children were in foster care in the Moundsville area. However, in September 1994, William John R. and Dana R. were moved to a foster home in Kanawha County, West Virginia, where they began to receive specialized care concerning their special needs. The moving of the children to Kanawha County placed them several hours drive from the appellant. As a result, the opportunities for visitation between the appellant and her children were significantly reduced. Weekly visits between the appellant and her two children became monthly visits.

Thereafter, in August 1995, the circuit court conducted an adjudicatory hearing upon the abuse and neglect petition. W. Va. Code, 49-6-2 [1992]. During the hearing, the evidence indicated (1) that the appellant, her husband, and the children exercised little or no personal hygiene in the home, See footnote 3 (2) that the children were not adequately fed, (3) that the home was dirty, roach infested, and had dog feces and urine upon the floor, (4) that the appellant had, on one occasion, struck Dana R. with a stick and (5) that, on other occasions, the appellant had, according to Dana, burned her with a cigarette and pulled out a section of Dana's hair. In addition, evidence was adduced at the hearing to the effect that, in one instance while at preschool, Dana displayed knowledge of sexual matters inappropriate for her age.

Following the adjudicatory hearing, the circuit court, on September 14, 1995, entered an order finding that the appellant and her husband had abused and neglected William John R. and Dana R. An appeal to this Court from that order was refused on May 29, 1996. W. VA. Code, 49-6-2(e) [1992].

In November 1995, the circuit court granted the appellant a post-adjudicatory improvement period, over the objection of the Department and the guardian ad litem. In addition, the circuit court directed the Department to develop a family case plan concerning the appellant and her children, and the Department was further directed to locate an appropriate foster home for William John R. and Dana R. "as close as possible" to Moundsville.

Subsequently, the circuit court entered an order in February 1996 stating that the Department should continue in its effort to locate local, specialized foster care for the children. In that order, however, the circuit court observed that "there is no appropriate foster placement in this area at this time, to meet the children's needs." Thereafter, the guardian ad litem moved to terminate the post-adjudicatory improvement period, and, in May and June 1996, the circuit court conducted evidentiary hearings.

The testimony received in evidence during those hearings was adduced from two witnesses, i.e., Shawna Bowles, a child therapist, and Dr. Charles William Hewitt, a clinical psychologist. Ms. Bowles, who had observed the appellant with the children, indicated that the appellant did not possess the skills necessary to work with William John R. and Dana R. More specifically, Dr. Hewitt, who had evaluated the appellant in March 1994 and in April 1996, indicated that no amount of parenting classes or on-the-job training could enable the appellant to independently manage the children. Consequently, according to Dr. Hewitt, it would be "in the best interest of the children to go into permanent guardianship with visits with their mother." Indicating that William John R. and Dana R. were "getting better," Dr. Hewitt testified that "[t]he important thing is to just be sensible about adapting the visiting schedule with the realities of where the child is placed."

Following the May and June 1996 hearings, the circuit court entered the final order of June 25, 1996. Although observing that the Department had failed to develop the family case plan previously ordered, the circuit court found "no reasonable likelihood" that William John R. and Dana R. could be reunited with the appellant. As a result, the circuit court terminated the post-adjudicatory improvement period and granted permanent guardianship of the children to the Department. In addition, the circuit court, without elaboration, ordered the Department to provide visitation between the appellant and the children. Although permanent guardianship was granted to the Department, the circuit court did not specifically terminate the appellant's parental rights to William John R. and Dana R.

In May 1997, this Court entered an order directing that the children not be moved from their Kanawha County placement, pending this appeal.

II.

In syllabus point 1 of In the Interest of: Tiffany Marie S., 196 W. Va. 223, 470 S.E.2d 177 (1996), this Court held that, although conclusions of law are subject to a de novo review, a circuit court's findings of fact, in a child abuse and neglect case, shall not be set aside unless clearly erroneous. See also syl. pt. 1, State ex rel. Virginia M. v. Virgil Eugene S., 197 W. Va. 456, 475 S.E.2d 548 (1996). In this case, however, the issue of whether abuse and neglect occurred is not before this Court in this appeal. That issue was adjudicated by the circuit court in 1995, and, as indicated above, an appeal from a finding of abuse and neglect was refused by this Court in May 1996. Rather, the issue before us concerns the termination of the appellant's subsequent improvement period and the granting of permanent guardianship to the Department of Health and Human Resources. Therefore, we acknowledge the more general standard of review, comparable to that expressed in Tiffany Marie S., set forth in syllabus point 1 of McCormick v. Allstate Insurance Company, 197 W. Va. 415, 475 S.E.2d 507 (1996):

> When this Court reviews challenges to the findings and conclusions of the circuit court, a two-prong deferential standard of review is applied. We review the final order and the ultimate disposition under an abuse of discretion standard, and we review the circuit court's underlying factual findings under a clearly erroneous standard.

See also State v. Jarvis, ___ W. Va. ___, ___, 483 S.E.2d 38, 43 (1996).

As stated above, the circuit court, in terminating the improvement period, found "no reasonable likelihood" that William John R. and Dana R. could be reunited with the appellant. As provided in W. Va. Code, 49-6-5(a)(6) [1992], permanent custody or guardianship of an abused or neglected child may be granted to the Department "[u]pon a finding that there is no reasonable likelihood that the conditions of neglect or abuse can be substantially corrected in the near future, and when necessary for the welfare of the child [.]" In particular, W. Va. Code, 49-6-5(b) [1992], states:

> As used in this section, 'no reasonable likelihood that conditions of neglect or abuse can be substantially corrected' shall mean that, based upon the evidence before the court, the abusing adult or adults have demonstrated an inadequate capacity to solve the problems of abuse and neglect, on their own or with help. Such conditions shall be deemed to exist in the following circumstances, which shall not be exclusive:
> . . . .
> (6) The abusing parent or parents have incurred emotional illness, mental illness or mental deficiency of such duration or nature as to render such parent or parents incapable of exercising proper > parenting skills or sufficiently improving the adequacy of such skills.

In this case, the appellant contends that the granting of permanent guardianship of William John R. and Dana R. to the Department constituted error because, inasmuch as her contact with the children necessarily diminished after they were moved to Kanawha County, she was denied a meaningful improvement period. Specifically, citing State ex rel. Department of Human Services v. Cheryl M., 177 W. Va. 688, 356 S.E.2d 181 (1987), the appellant suggests that, in the absence of compelling circumstances, she was entitled to a more appropriate improvement period as a matter of right. See footnote 4 On the other hand, contending that the rights of the appellant were subordinate to the interests of her children, the guardian ad litem asserts (1) that it is undisputed that William John R. and Dana R. are "special needs children" requiring specialized care, (2) that the move to Kanawha County was in the children's best interests and (3) that the appellant could never, under any circumstances, independently manage them. Thus, citing In the Interest of Carlita B., 185 W. Va. 613, 408 S.E.2d 365 (1991), the guardian ad litem indicates that the circuit court was not compelled to "exhaust every speculative possibility of parental improvement" prior to granting permanent guardianship to the Department. See footnote 5 The Department contends before this Court that the equities require either the restoration of the appellant's improvement period or the granting of meaningful visitation to the appellant.

Recently, in syllabus point 3 of In re Katie S., 198 W. Va. 79, 479 S.E.2d 589 (1996), this Court held: "Although parents have substantial rights that must be protected, the primary goal in cases involving abuse and neglect, as in all family law matters, must be the health and welfare of the children." Here, the circuit court acknowledged that the placement of William John R. and Dana R. in specialized foster care in Kanawha County significantly reduced the contacts between the children and the appellant during both the pre-adjudicatory and post-adjudicatory improvement periods. Moreover, the circuit court noted that the Department of Health and Human Resources failed to develop the family case plan previously ordered. See footnote 6 Clearly, those circumstances have been detrimental to the appellant in this case. However, as the guardian ad litem correctly points out, it is undisputed that William John R. and Dana R. are "special needs children." Importantly, as the record before us demonstrates, those children are currently receiving in Kanawha County the continuing, specialized care they need. As the circuit court observed in 1996: "[T]here is no appropriate foster placement in this [Moundsville] area at this time, to meet the children's needs." An examination of the record reveals that the Department made attempts to locate an appropriate, local foster home throughout the history of this litigation.

Moreover, the evidence indicates that the appellant suffers from an "emotional illness, mental illness or mental deficiency of such duration or nature as to render . . . [her] incapable of exercising proper parenting skills or sufficiently improving the adequacy of such skills" within the meaning of W. Va. Code, 49-6-5(b) [1992]. The appellant has been diagnosed with significant mental problems, including mild mental retardation, various personality disorders, depression and anxiety, and, as stated above, Dr. Hewitt indicated that no amount of parenting classes or on-the-job training could assist her with regard to the children. See footnote 7 In fact, during oral argument before this Court, the guardian ad litem stated that the appellant could not grasp the concept of the nurturing parent, and counsel for the appellant acknowledged that the appellant needs help concerning the children. As stated above, the family had been monitored by the Department prior to the filing of the abuse and neglect petition in February 1994. As the April 29, 1996, report of Dr. Hewitt explains:

> [The appellant] can take care of her everyday adaptive needs, including personal hygiene, most of the time, but she is easily exploitable and needs someone to take care of her money. When she isn't supervised she sometimes neglects her personal hygiene. . . . Her memory processes are consistent with mild mental retardation, she has a poor sense of time, and she is an unreliable reporter of many important events in her life, and she certainly doesn't report abuse and neglect matters accurately or with any meaningful insight. . . . Her children have special needs, but special needs aside, she is not able to independently manage the ordinary needs of her children or any other children. . . . [I]n spite of the bonding, the children are, in their own way, requesting protection from their mother, though they do not articulate their concerns maturely. . . . Because of [the appellant's] irremediable difficulties related to child rearing, and because there is a significant bond between [the appellant] and her children, and because [the appellant's] children need to be protected and their special needs managed, it is recommended that the children be placed in permanent foster care, that [the appellant] be allowed periodic visits with them, and that the children be told in therapy that they will be in permanent care and allowed to have contact with their mother [.]

Although this Court does not sanction the reduction in contacts between the appellant and William John R. and Dana R., occasioned by the placement of those children in Kanawha County, and does not sanction the failure to develop a family case plan, it is clear that the childrens' special needs are currently being addressed in Kanawha County (in the absence of an appropriate foster home in the Moundsville area) and the appellant, as well, has special needs within the meaning of W. Va. Code, 49-6-5(b) [1992], rendering her incapable of adequately parenting the children. The circumstances herein, thus, lead this Court to the inexorable conclusion that the avenues of justice, in this difficult case, were not narrowed by the final order of June 25, 1996. Accordingly, this Court is of the opinion that the circuit court acted within its discretion in terminating the improvement period and granting permanent guardianship of William John R. and Dana R. to the Department of Health and Human Resources. In that respect, therefore, the final order is affirmed. Furthermore, based upon the representation of counsel to this Court concerning the commitment of the Kanawha County foster parents to the children, we further hold that William John R. and Dana R. be permanently placed in that foster home, i.e., the home of Mr. and Mrs. M., where the children have resided since 1994, subject to periodic monitoring by the Department as required by law.

The problem of visitation, however, is, no doubt, derivative of the absence of the family case plan. Moreover, the circuit court, without elaboration, simply ordered the Department to provide visitation between the appellant and the children.

As this Court observed, generally, in syllabus point 5 of In re Christina L., 194 W. Va. 446, 460 S.E.2d 692 (1995):

> When parental rights are terminated due to neglect or abuse, the circuit court may nevertheless in appropriate cases consider whether continued visitation or other contact with the abusing parent is in the best interest of the child. Among other things, the circuit court should consider whether a close emotional bond has been established between parent and child and the child's wishes, if he or she is of appropriate maturity to make such request. The evidence must indicate that such visitation or continued contact would not be detrimental to the child's well being and would be in the child's best interest.

See also In re Danielle T., 195 W. Va. 530, 535, 466 S.E.2d 189, 194 (1995).

In this case, the record contains evidence of bonding between the appellant and the children. Moreover, inasmuch as the above principle of In re Christina L. was expressed in the context of the termination of parental rights, here, where the appellant's parental rights were not specifically terminated, visitation, a fortiori, is warranted. We note, however, that the visitation exercised by the appellant, during the proceedings below, was supervised.

Upon all of the above, therefore, this Court affirms the final order of the Circuit Court of Marshall County, entered on June 25, 1996, to the extent that the appellant's improvement period was terminated and permanent guardianship of William John R. and Dana R. was granted to the West Virginia Department of Health and Human Services. Furthermore, William John R. and Dana R. shall be permanently placed in their Kanawha County foster home, i.e., the home of Mr. and Mrs. M., where the children have resided since 1994, subject to periodic monitoring by the Department as required by law. However, we remand this case to the circuit court for the development and execution of a plan of supervised visitation between the appellant and the children. Upon remand, the circuit court shall consider and establish a time, no later than which the Department shall submit the visitation plan for the circuit court's review, in order for the appellant to soon have appropriate contact with her children.

Footnote: 2 Following the separation of the appellant and Sidney L., Sr., and the institution of divorce proceedings, Sidney L., Jr., who is considerably older than William John R. and Dana R., remained with his father. Thereafter, in September 1995, the circuit court entered an order dismissing both Sidney L., Jr., and his father from these proceedings. The September order specifically noted that Sidney, L., Jr., and his father, had successfully completed the goals set for them by the Department.

Footnote: 3With regard to personal hygiene, Jennifer Horton Bloch, a case aid services worker, testified as follows: "The children were very dirty, had a very prominent odor to them. Their clothes were often ill-fitting and food all over them. When we informed [the appellant] that she needed to do some hygiene with her children, there was often soap left in their hair."

Footnote: 4 W. Va. Code, 49-6-2, provides for improvement periods in child abuse and neglect cases, and, referring to that statute, syllabus point 2 of Cheryl M., states: "W. Va. Code, 49-6-2(b) (1984), permits a parent to move the court for an improvement period which shall be allowed unless the court finds compelling circumstances to justify a denial."

Footnote: 5 In Carlita B., 185 W. Va. at 629, 408 S.E.2d at 381, this Court cited syllabus point 1 of In re R.J.M., 164 W. Va. 496, 266 S.E.2d 114 (1980), which states in part: "[C]ourts are not required to exhaust every speculative possibility of parental improvement before terminating parental rights where it appears that the welfare of the child will be seriously threatened."

Footnote: 6 As stated in W. Va. Code, 49-6-2(b) [1992], an order entered by a circuit court granting an improvement period shall require the Department "to prepare and submit to the court a family case plan[.]"

Footnote: 7 Dr. Hewitt's report dated March 27, 1994, states: "[The appellant] is not empathetic, and this is one of the reasons she finds it very difficult to protect her children. Her lack of empathy is associated with her highly neurotic style which probably leads to histrionic and hysterical episodes."

Workman, C.J., concurring:

While I agree with the majority's ultimate conclusion affirming the final order of the Circuit Court of Marshall County, I write separately to emphasize the importance of the circuit court taking the time to develop a workable plan for a continued relationship between these children and their mother. This case is a hard one, not only because of the geographic distance between the children and their mother made a meaningful improvement period difficult, but also because of the strong emotional bond that still exists between these children and their mother. Because the record clearly demonstrates Appellant's limited ability to care for the special needs of her children and because these children have a permanent foster home placement (with parents willing to make a permanent commitment to them and with whom they have lived for three years), I agree that it is in the children's best interest to affirm the placement. As this Court stated in In re Carlita B., 185 W. Va. 613, 408 S.E.2d 365 (1991):

> In the difficult balance which must be fashioned between the rights of the parent and the welfare of the child, we have consistently emphasized that the paramount and controlling factor must be the child's welfare. "[A]ll parental rights in child custody matters," we have stressed, "are subordinate to the interests of the innocent child." David M., 182 W. Va. [57,] at 60, 385 S.E.2d [912,]at 916 [(1989)].

Id. at 629, 408 S.E.2d at 381. Nevertheless, it also is important in appropriate cases to develop a meaningful plan for children to have a continued relationship with their parents. See generally Syl. Pt. 5, In re Christina L., 194 W. Va. 446, 460 S.E.2d 692 (1995). See footnote 1 The majority recognizes such a situation exists in this case and, therefore, remanded this case for the circuit court to develop and execute a plan of supervised visitation.

In developing this plan, the circuit court must take care in assuring that the plan is realistic and workable. This evaluation shall include even the most basic of issues that must be resolved in order for the children to have visitations with Appellant. For instance, by way of analogy, in footnote fifteen of In re Carlita B., this Court mentioned with respect to improvement periods that the circuit court must be apprised of any foreseeable "obstacles to compliance with the plan of improvement, and the court should make any directives necessary to obliterate such obstacles." 185 W. Va. at 625 n.15, 408 S.E.2d at 377 n.15. For example, we said "[i]f the parent indicates he is unable to attend a specified program due to lack of transportation or conflict with hours of employment, the circuit court can direct the D.H.S. to assist with transportation or arrange a program which does not conflict with the parent's work schedule." Id. Likewise, in the instant case, to meet the best interest of these children, the circuit court may find it necessary to involve itself in the most minute of details, such as specifically directing the Department to provide bus (or other) transportation for Appellant in order to get her to and from her visits, or arranging and paying for lodging if Appellant cannot afford it. Although these details seem tedious and mundane, unless the time is taken to examine considerations like these, the visitation plan will be useless and, inevitably, the children will not have the benefit of a continued relationship with someone they love.

These permanent foster care parents also will have challenges before them. Broken human relationships (and in this case, a long-distance continued relationship with the mother) can be inconvenient and at times discouraging for these foster parents. The Department should also work to assist them in the transition to this new arrangement. If needed, the children, the foster parents, and the biological mother should be provided with family counseling. In other words, the lower court on remand will be called upon to do both legal and social work to help make this work for the children. However, if the judge is successful, the work he does here will be more meaningful and significant than any multi-million dollar civil litigation he might preside over.

When parental rights are terminated due to neglect or abuse, the circuit court may nevertheless in appropriate cases consider whether continued visitation or other contact with the abusing parent is in the best interest of the child. Among other things, the circuit court should consider whether a close emotional bond has been established between parent and child and the child's wishes, if he or she is of appropriate maturity to make such request. The evidence must indicate that such visitation or continued contact would not be detrimental to the child's well being and would be in the child's best interest.

Starcher, Justice, dissenting:

I understand the position taken by the majority in this case, but I believe we should require the circuit court to allow the improvement period to continue. I am concerned that we not too hastily sever the bonds between children and parents who, because of limited abilities, are less than ideal parents.

The majority opinion does not note that all of the parties to this case, including the guardian ad litem, asked this court on April 22, 1997 to postpone the hearing of this appeal, because they were still trying to reach an agreed settlement. (They had already requested and received one continuance, in January, 1997, for the same purpose.)

The parties' second request for a continuance included the following statements:

> Although the children continue to reside in a specialized foster care home in Kanawha County, significant effort is being made by the Department to locate an appropriate foster home much closer to their mother. Currently a home study is being completed regarding a potential foster home in Wellsburg, West Virginia.

Counsel for the parties met with members of the Multi-Disciplinary Team (MDT) on March 7, 1997, and participated in discussions with Ms. W[.], her family, and representatives from the service agencies which assist both she and her children. Counsel for the Department attended the children's Individualized Treatment Team (ITT) meeting on April 11, 1997, and all counsel have been invited to an MDT meeting to be held on May 2, 1997.

According to counsel for Evelyn Richards W[.], the respondent mother does not want to proceed with the oral arguments. Although Ms. W[.] clearly wants her children to be placed in a nearby foster home, she also appears to understand the careful attention which must be given to the placement. To the best of this writer's knowledge, visitation with the children in the Moundsville area is scheduled for the weekend of April 25, 1997 or May 2, 1997. Additionally, it is possible that the foster parents may transport the children and remain in the Moundsville area during the visitation. This was discussed at the ITT meeting as a means to reduce the amount of disruption to the children's lives. There is some evidence that Dana R[.] (seven years old) exhibits regressive behaviors when her routine and expectations are altered.

A new family case plan is being developed through the MDT process. During the meeting on March 7, 1997, . . . Ms. W[.]'s therapist, noted the respondent mother's increased understanding and responsibility. The children's therapist . . . commented that during a recent visit with her children, Ms. W[.] had attempted to explain to them the court system and its role in their lives. Both Ms. W[.] and her husband, Harold "Frank" W[.] agreed to cooperate in all efforts which address the best interests of the children. Additionally, Ms. W[.] is being encouraged to continue her increased commitment to programs of community integration, socialization, and individual therapy.

This Court denied the request for a second continuance -- feeling, I believe, that we needed to hear exactly what was happening, and first-hand.

In its brief before this Court, the DHHR acknowledged that it was fair to say that equity favored allowing the improvement period to continue. I can't improve on the eloquence and sincerity of the statements made to this Court by the agency that has the most intimate knowledge of the situation:

As noted in the statement of facts, counsel for the parties hereto attempted to resolve this matter. At the time it appeared as if the circuit court's statements regarding the Department's "winning" and its clear frustration with the inability of the foster care system to accommodate Billy and Dana would result in a favorable decision for the Petitioner. The undersigned believed such a favorable decision would order the Department to find a more local specialized foster care home and develop a "pragmatic" family case plan. Although the oral argument on May 6, 1997, cast a different light upon the appeal and its outcome, the Department believes it would be ingenuous to ignore the expectations and efforts of Evelyn and her family.

My colleagues in this matter would no doubt agree that we learned more about the complexities and inadequacies of the system of care for special children than we perhaps wanted to know. The "specialness" of Billy and Dana and their need for appropriate nurturing, understanding, and patience was the primary and guiding factor. Evelyn also has very special needs and, sadly, she may not be blessed with the capacity to meet her children's needs.

Perhaps the guardian ad litem is correct in his analysis that "a reluctance to visit such a fate upon a woman who will never understand why it happened resulted in the granting of more opportunities for improvement than were warranted by the evidence." (Guardian's brief, p. 19). We are justifiably outraged and punitive when abuse and neglect is visited upon children out of malice or angry illness; however, the response is not so definitive when the parent suffers from mental retardation and "neurotic dysfunction." Children must be assured safety in either situation, but an intellectual capacity which will not allow for that protection does not always signify a lack of love. It is prudent as well as humane to exercise greater caution when the respondent parents are mentally challenged, if only because of the realization that only a matter of "grace" separates any of us from Evelyn, Billy, or Dana.

There have been months of intensive effort directed toward the location of an appropriate placement for Billy and Dana in a foster home closer to their mother. Evelyn and her husband, Frank, as well as the children's maternal grandmother, have fully cooperated with any suggestions made by the MDT members. [T]he Department's caseworker, has invested innumerable hours in the quest for a home and in the formulation of the framework of a family case plan. The Department is steadfast in its belief that all children must be safe and protected from inadvertent as well as intentional harm, but the obvious complexities of this case are further complicated by the reality of Evelyn's love for her children. Hence, the greater willingness to allow her an opportunity for improvement.

Furthermore, there is an acute awareness that if Evelyn had lived in Kanawha County instead of Marshall County, her children would most likely have been placed close by and her compliance with a plan of improvement much more easily evaluated. The Department recognizes the Court's frustration with the length of time these children have been in care, but the Court is no more frustrated than the Department with the dearth of foster homes for children with special needs in Marshall and the surrounding counties. The circuit court noted its ascent from "denial" regarding the availability of a local home. . . . And although it is easy to attribute this lack to some insufficiency on the Department's part, the problem is systemic. Consequently, the issue becomes one of fairness -- the respondent's mother's essential argument.

It is out of this sense of fairness that the Department remains committed to finding a more local placement for Billy or Dana. Not only for Evelyn and the meaningfulness of an improvement period, but because the record is not consistent regarding the effects upon the children of separation from her. Dr. H[.] reported "significant bonding if not the best of bonding," and he testified that the children should have continued contact with their mother because of the amount of bonding which exists between them. . . .

No one is more aware than the Department of the length of time Billy and Dana have been in their current placement. However, the record is clear that the Department has, from the beginning, attempted to comply with the orders of the circuit court. Intimate contact with this case reinforces the knowledge that assessing blame is futile and misplaced. It is imperative that children in the Department's custody be assured safety and nurturing care; therefore, not everyone can or should be a foster parent. And to successfully parent a special needs child the foster parents must be willing to undergo training and education as well as facilitate the necessary medical or mental health care and attention.

Because Billy and Dana have been out of their mother's care for over three years and out of her geographic locale for much of that time, it is difficult to know exactly what the best interests of the children are. Similarly, although the professionals seem to agree that Evelyn cannot parent independently, that too is an unknown. During the pendency of this appeal the Department has had indications that Evelyn is not wholly dissatisfied with the placement of Billy and Dana into foster care. This is understandable in light of her limitations and may reflect Evelyn's recognition of those limitations. However, Evelyn and her family consistently express a desire to see Billy and Dana and have gone to extraordinary lengths to do so.

This Court in its holdings and in its comments from the bench has recognized that if in the best interests of the children, visitation with the natural parents may continue even after the termination of parental rights. In re Christina L., 460 S.E.2d 692 (W.Va. 1995). However, just as my colleagues and I learned much about the placement of special children, the undersigned was enlightened as to the sheer logistics of visitation between parents and children at distant points. Clearly, this Court is committed to maintaining visitation when there is significant bonding; however, it is imperative to recognize the realities of visitation - transportation, expense, time, and a setting within which to visit.

There is ample legal and factual evidence of record to support an affirmation of the circuit court's order of June 25, 1996. There are also equitable and good faith reasons to restore Evelyn R.'s improvement period, or in the alternative, provide for meaningful visitation by the placement of Billy and Dana is a more local but abundantly appropriate foster home.

Because I agree with this reading of the fairness issue, I would restore the improvement period.

CHIEF JUSTICE McHUGH delivered the Opinion of the Court.

JUSTICE BROTHERTON AND JUSTICE RECHT did not participate.

JUDGE FOX and RETIRED JUSTICE MILLER sitting by temporary assignment.

RETIRED JUSTICE MILLER and JUSTICE CLECKLEY concur, in part, and dissent, in part, for the same reasons stated by Justice Miller in his dissent in State v. Edward Charles L., 183 W. Va. 641, 398 S.E.2d 123 (1990).

SYLLABUS BY THE COURT

1. "To trigger application of the 'plain error' doctrine, there must be (1) an error; (2) that is plain; (3) that affects substantial rights; and (4) seriously affects the fairness, integrity, or public reputation of the judicial proceedings." Syl. pt. 7, State v. Miller, No. 22571, ___ W. Va. ___, ___ S.E.2d ___ (May 18, 1995).

2. West Virginia Rules of Evidence 608(a) permits the admission of evidence in the form of an opinion or reputation regarding a witness's character for truthfulness or untruthfulness, subject to two limitations: (1) the evidence may refer only to character for truthfulness or untruthfulness; and (2) evidence of truthful character is admissible only after the character of the witness for truthfulness has been attacked by opinion or reputation evidence or otherwise. The admission of testimony pursuant to W. Va. R. Evid. 608(a) is within the sound discretion of the trial judge and is subject to W. Va. R. Evid. 402, which requires the evidence to be relevant; W. Va. R. Evid. 403, which requires the exclusion of evidence whose "probative value is substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice, confusion of the issues, or misleading the jury[;]" and W. Va. R. Evid. 611, which requires the court to protect witnesses from harassment and undue embarrassment.

3. "Expert psychological testimony is permissible in cases involving incidents of child sexual abuse and an expert may state an opinion as to whether the child comports with the psychological and behavioral profile of a child sexual abuse victim, and may offer an opinion based on objective findings that the child has been sexually abused. Such an expert may not give an opinion as to whether he personally believes the child, nor an opinion as to whether the sexual assault was committed by the defendant, as these would improperly and prejudicially invade the province of the jury." Syl. pt. 7, State v. Edward Charles L., 183 W. Va. 641, 398 S.E.2d 123 (1990).

4. """"Whether a witness is qualified to state an opinion is a matter which rests within the discretion of the trial court and its ruling on that point will not ordinarily be disturbed unless it clearly appears that its discretion has been abused." Point 5, syllabus, Overton v. Fields, 145 W. Va. 797 [117 S.E.2d 598 (1960)].' Syllabus Point 4, Hall v. Nello Teer Co., 157 W. Va. 582, 203 S.E.2d 145 (1974)." Syllabus Point 12, Board of Education v. Zando, Martin & Milstead, 182 W. Va. 597, 390 S.E.2d 796 (1990).' Syl. pt. 3, Wilt v. Buracker, 191 W. Va. 39, 443 S.E.2d 196 (1993)." Syl. pt. 5, Mayhorn v. Logan Medical Foundation, ___ W. Va. ___, 454 S.E.2d 87 (1994).

5. "In the West Virginia courts, claims of ineffective assistance of counsel are to be governed by the two-pronged test established in Strickland v. Washington, 466 U.S. 668, 104 S. Ct. 2052, 80 L. Ed. 2d 674 (1984): (1) Counsel's performance was deficient under an objective standard of reasonableness; and (2) there is a reasonable probability that, but for counsel's unprofessional errors, the result of the proceedings would have been different." Syl. pt. 5, State v. Miller, No. 22571, ___ W. Va. ___, ___ S.E.2d ___ (May 18, 1995).

6. "In reviewing counsel's performance, courts must apply an objective standard and determine whether, in light of all the circumstances, the identified acts or omissions were outside the broad range of professionally competent assistance while at the same time refraining from engaging in hindsight or second-guessing of trial counsel's strategic decisions. Thus, a reviewing court asks whether a reasonable lawyer would have acted, under the circumstances, as defense counsel acted in the case at issue." Syl. pt. 6, State v. Miller, No. 22571, ___ W. Va. ___, ___ S.E.2d ___ (May 18, 1995).

7. "'Under ex post facto principles of the United States and West Virginia Constitutions, a law passed after the commission of an offense which increases the punishment, lengthens the sentence or operates to the detriment of the accused, cannot be applied to him.' Syl. pt. 1, Adkins v. Bordenkircher, 164 W. Va. 292, 262 S.E.2d 885 (1980)." Syl. pt. 6, State ex rel. Collins v. Bedell, No. 22781, ___ W. Va. ___, ___ S.E.2d ___ (June 19, 1995).

8. "A procedural change in a criminal proceeding does not violate the ex post facto principles found in the W. Va. Const. art. III, § 4 and in the U. S. Const. art. I, § 10 unless the procedural change alters the definition of a crime so that what is currently punished as a crime was an innocent act when committed; deprives the accused of a defense which existed when the crime was committed; or increases the punishment for the crime after it was committed." Syl. pt. 7, State ex rel. Collins v. Bedell, No. 22781, ___ W. Va. ___, ___ S.E.2d ___ (June 19, 1995).

McHugh, Chief Justice:

Following a one-day jury trial, the appellant, Forrest M. Wood, was convicted of two counts of first degree sexual assault and two counts of incest in the Circuit Court of Cabell County. The appellant was sentenced to prison terms of fifteen to thirty- five years on each of the first degree sexual assault counts and to five to fifteen years on each of the incest counts, with all sentences running consecutively.

The appellant appeals his convictions raising the following four assignments of error: (1) whether the admission of the testimony of Mr. Donald Pace, a teacher, wherein he stated that he determined the victim's allegations against the appellant were true before he took any action regarding those allegations, was error; (2) whether the admission of the expert testimony of Elizabeth Brachna was error in that (a) she was not properly qualified as an expert, (b) she testified that the victim's allegations were credible, and (c) she based her testimony upon the child sexual abuse profile; (3) whether the appellant was denied effective assistance of counsel; and (4) whether the appellant was sentenced in violation of the ex post facto principles set forth in the West Virginia and United States Constitutions. For reasons set forth below, we affirm, in part, reverse, in part, and remand this case to the circuit court for the defendant's resentencing in accordance with this opinion.

I.

The appellant married the mother of the victim, Betty A., See footnote 1 in 1981, thereby becoming Betty A.'s stepfather. At trial, Betty A. testified that once or twice a week in 1989, when she was approximately eight or nine years old, she was forced to engage in various sexual acts with the appellant.See footnote 2 Betty A. first reported the sexual assaults in the spring of 1992 to her behavior disorder teacher, Donald Pace, who testified at trial. Additionally, Elizabeth Brachna, a licensed social worker, and Vicki Riley, a supervised psychologistSee footnote 3 in private practice, who were qualified as experts on abused and assaulted children, both testified that in their opinion Betty A.'s behavior fit the profile of a sexually abused child. Betty A.'s mother's testimony supported Betty A.'s and the experts' testimonies. Conversely, the appellant testified that he did not sexually assault Betty A.

The appellant and Betty A.'s mother separated in November of 1989, and a divorce action soon ensued. The evidence at trial indicates that Betty A. has had no contact with the appellant since her mother and the appellant separated.

II.

The appellant asserts that the admission of Donald Pace's testimony regarding the truthfulness of Betty A.'s allegations against the appellant was error. However, as the appellant concedes, the appellant's trial attorney did not object to the admission of this testimony.See footnote 4 Therefore, the admission of this testimony must invoke the plain error doctrine before this Court will reverse the appellant's conviction. In syllabus point 7 of State v. Miller, No. 22571, ___ W. Va. ___, ___ S.E.2d ___ (May 18, 1995) this Court held that in order "[t]o trigger application of the 'plain error' doctrine, there must be (1) an error; (2) that is plain; (3) that affects substantial rights; and (4) seriously affects the fairness, integrity, or public reputation of the judicial proceedings." See also syllabus point 4, in relevant part, State v. England, 180 W. Va. 342, 376 S.E.2d 548 (1988) (The plain error "doctrine is to be used sparingly and only in those circumstances where substantial rights are affected, or the truth-finding process is substantially impaired, or a miscarriage of justice would otherwise result.")

The appellant complains about the admission of the following testimony by Donald Pace:

Q [This excerpt of testimony occurs after Mr. Pace has testified that he did not report Betty A.'s allegations until he determined whether or not they were true] [by the State] You indicated that you had come to the conclusion that [Betty A.] was not making this up; is that correct?

A [by Mr. Pace] That's correct.

Q Why do you say that?

A Well, for one thing, after I had established a relationship with [Betty A.], I found out that when she was lying, if I pursued my questioning, she would always tell me the truth.

Q Now, wait a minute. So, you're saying that [Betty A.] has lied to you?

A In terms that she may deny that she had done something, and when I questioned her about that, she would often say, 'Oh, no, Mr. Pace, that wasn't me, I didn't do that, I didn't do that,' and when I pursued the matter, she would always own up to it.

Q Always?

A Well, to my knowledge, yes.

. . . .

Q So, in your opinion, based on your work with [Betty A.], she's basically a truthful person?

A Oh, yes. Now, qualifying that, if she could get out of trouble, she would.

. . . .

Q . . . Did you investigate [Betty A.'s allegations of sexual assault], to your satisfaction, to determine whether or not she was, in fact, telling you the truth?

A Yes, I did because -- in fact, we had -- you know, I explained the severity of making an accusation like that. . . . [S]he at that time convinced me that she was telling the truth.

At the outset, we note that this issue involves the admission of testimony regarding the credibility of a witness. As observed by the United States Court of Military Appeals, "[t]here are three evidentiary stages which concern the credibility of witnesses at trial: bolstering, impeachment, and rehabilitation." United States v. Toro, 37 M.J. 313, 315 (C.M.A. 1993). Bolstering occurs when a party seeks to enhance a witness's credibility before it has been attacked. Id. Bolstering is generally disallowed. Impeachment occurs anytime a witness's credibility is attacked, and it may be accomplished in several different ways including, inter alia, the following: a witness's character trait for untruthfulness pursuant to W. Va. R. Evid. 608(a); prior convictions pursuant to W. Va. R. Evid. 609(a); instances of misconduct not resulting in a conviction pursuant to W. Va. R. Evid. 608(b); and prior inconsistent statements pursuant to W. Va. R. Evid. 613.See footnote 5 See Id. Rehabilitation, which occurs after a witness's credibility has been attacked, also may be accomplished in a number of different ways including "explanations on redirect examination, corroboration, a character trait for truthfulness, or prior consistent statements." Toro, supra at 315 (citation omitted). Credibility issues concerning a witness may be addressed by questioning that witness or through the testimony of another witness.

Although not briefed by the appellant, the resolution of the issue before us involves an analysis of W. Va. R. Evid. 608. W. Va. R. Evid. 608(a) allows for the admission of evidence which either attacks or supports the credibility of a witness in the form of opinion or reputation subject to two limitations:

The credibility of a witness may be attacked or supported by evidence in the form of opinion or reputation, but subject to these limitations: (1) the evidence may refer only to character for truthfulness or untruthfulness; and (2) evidence of truthful character is admissible only after the character of the witness for truthfulness has been attacked by opinion or reputation evidence or otherwise.

W. Va. R. Evid. 608(a).

The first limitation found in 608(a)(1), which states "the evidence may refer only to character for truthfulness or untruthfulness[,]" explicitly "permits [opinion] testimony concerning a witness's general character or reputation for truthfulness or untruthfulness but prohibits any [opinion] testimony as to a witness's truthfulness on a particular occasion." State v. Rimmasch, 775 P.2d 388, 391 (Utah 1989) (citations omitted). The rationale behind disallowing opinion testimony as to a witness's truthfulness on a particular occasion is that "it prevents trials from being turned into contests between what would amount to modern oath-helpers who would largely usurp the fact- finding function of judge or jury." Id. at 392. See also United States v. Azure, 801 F.2d 336, 341 (8th Cir. 1986) (The "opinion evidence went beyond the limitation in Rule 608(a)(1) of only addressing character for truthfulness and addressed the specific believability and truthfulness of [the witness's] story."); People v. Koon, 713 P.2d 410, 412 (Colo. Ct. App. 1985) ("[N]either a lay nor expert witness may give opinion testimony with respect to whether a witness is telling the truth on a specific occasion." (citations omitted)).

We implicitly acknowledged the wisdom of the above rationale in syllabus point 7, in relevant part, of State v. Edward Charles L., 183 W. Va. 641, 398 S.E.2d 123 (1990), when we held that an expert on child sexual abuse "may not give an opinion as to whether he personally believes the child . . . as [this] would improperly and prejudicially invade the province of the jury."

The second limitation found in W. Va. R. Evid. 608(a)(2), states "evidence of truthful character is admissible only after the character of the witness for truthfulness has been attacked by opinion or reputation evidence or otherwise[.]" This limitation disallows the bolstering of a witness's credibility. See 1 Franklin D. Cleckley, Handbook on Evidence for West Virginia Lawyers § 6.8(A)(1) (3d 1994) and 3 Jack B. Weinstein, et al., Weinstein's Evidence ¶ 608[08] (1995). After all, "a person's character is assumed to be good unless evidence exists to indicate otherwise." Cleckley, supra at § 6-8(A)(2). See also Weinstein, supra at ¶ 608[08] at 608-64. ("'[T]here is no reason why time should be spent in proving that which may be assumed to exist.'" (quoting Wigmore, Evidence § 1104 (3d ed. 1940)).

Moreover, W. Va. R. Evid. 608(a) is subject to the protections of W. Va. R. Evid. 402, which requires the evidence to be relevant; W. Va. R. Evid. 403, which requires the exclusion of evidence whose "probative value is substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice, confusion of the issues, or misleading the jury[;]" and W. Va. R. Evid. 611, which requires the court to protect witnesses from harassment and undue embarrassment. See Weinstein, supra at ¶ 608[01] at 608-13 and Cleckley, supra at § 6- 8(A)(2). Thus, the admissibility of evidence regarding a witness's character for truthfulness or untruthfulness is within the sound discretion of the trial judge, and depends upon the totality of the circumstances of a given case. See Id.

Accordingly, we hold that West Virginia Rules of Evidence 608(a) permits the admission of evidence in the form of an opinion or reputation regarding a witness's character for truthfulness or untruthfulness, subject to two limitations: (1) the evidence may refer only to character for truthfulness or untruthfulness; and (2) evidence of truthful character is admissible only after the character of the witness for truthfulness has been attacked by opinion or reputation evidence or otherwise. The admission of testimony pursuant to W. Va. R. Evid. 608(a) is within the sound discretion of the trial judge and is subject to W. Va. R. Evid. 402, which requires the evidence to be relevant; W. Va. R. Evid. 403, which requires the exclusion of evidence whose "probative value is substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice, confusion of the issues, or misleading the jury[;]" and W. Va. R. Evid. 611, which requires the court to protect witnesses from harassment and undue embarrassment.

In the case before us, we find that Mr. Pace's testimony violates the two limitations set forth in W. Va. R. Evid. 608 in that Mr. Pace gave his opinion as to Betty A's truthfulness on a specific occasion and testified as to her truthfulness before her character for truthfulness had been attacked. As we previously indicated, no objection was made at trial. Thus, we must determine if the admission of Mr. Pace's testimony was plain error. We conclude that it is not.

As we previously stated, Mr. Pace, who was Betty A.'s behavior disorder teacher, was the first person to whom Betty A. reported the sexual assaults. At trial, Mr. Pace, the State's first witness, testified that when Betty A. first told him of the sexual assault he did not immediately report her allegations because he wanted to make sure they were true.

However, the record reveals that there was no need for the prosecutor to engage in the questioning of Betty A.'s character for truthfulness in that Betty A.'s credibility had not yet been attacked. In fact, Betty A.'s credibility was not an issue until the prosecutor made it an issue.See footnote 6 As we previously stated, a witness's character for truthfulness is assumed to be truthful until attacked. Thus, the admission of Mr. Pace's testimony regarding Betty A.'s character for truthfulness was error pursuant to W. Va. R. Evid. 608(a) because it was admitted before her character for truthfulness had been attacked. Furthermore, Mr. Pace's opinion testimony as to whether Betty A.'s allegations of sexual assault were believable is error pursuant to W. Va. R. Evid. 608(a) in that it improperly invades the province of the jury.

However, as the testimony above reveals, Mr. Pace was merely giving an historical account as to how he learned of Betty A.'s sexual assault allegations and as to how he determined what actions he should take regarding those allegations. Although Mr. Pace's testimony violates W. Va. R. Evid. 608(a), his testimony was not given for the purpose of determining Betty A.'s character for truthfulness which is the paramount concern of W. Va. R. Evid. 608, but rather was given as historical information. Cf. United States v. Blackwell, 853 F.2d 86 (2d Cir. 1988) (Fed. R. Evid. 608(a) does not preclude testimony by an accused of his lack of a criminal record because such testimony is essentially background information); Government of Virgin Islands v. Grant, 775 F.2d 508, 513 n. 7 (3d Cir. 1985) (The Court of Appeals for the Third Circuit noted that the line between background evidence and character evidence is blurred). Thus, although we find that the admission of the above testimony by Mr. Pace violates W. Va.

R. Evid. 608(a), we recognize that it is a close call considering the purpose for which this testimony was introduced. Cf. United States v. Toledo, 985 F.2d 1462, 1469-70 (10th Cir. 1993), cert. denied, ___ U.S. ___, 114 S. Ct. 218 (An expert's statement in a case in which a child was kidnapped and sexually assaulted that the child's consistency in her story was "'consistent with a high likelihood that this occurred'" did not warrant review under the plain error doctrine because it is a close call and therefore not an obvious error affecting the fundamental fairness of the trial).

Accordingly, although the admission of Mr. Pace's testimony regarding Betty A.'s character for truthfulness was error pursuant to W. Va. R. Evid. 608(a), given the context in which this particular testimony occurred we find that it does not "seriously affect[ ] the fairness, integrity, or public reputation of the judicial proceedings" thereby implicating review pursuant to the plain error doctrine. Syl. pt. 7, Miller, supra.

III.

Although not clearly defined, it appears that the appellant raises the following three issues regarding the testimony of Elizabeth Brachna, who testified as an expert on abused and assaulted children, which are as follows: (a) whether Ms. Brachna was properly qualified as an expert; (b) whether Ms. Brachna's testimony regarding the truthfulness of Betty A.'s story violates syllabus point 7 of Edward Charles L., supra; and (c) whether the law in Edward Charles L., supra, regarding the admission of a child sexual abuse profile is a sound principle or whether the case should be overruled.

A.

The appellant's trial counsel objected to Ms. Brachna being qualified as an expert on abused and assaulted children because she was not a treating psychiatrist or psychologist. In syllabus point 7 of Edward Charles L., supra, this Court held that expert psychological testimony regarding child sexual abuse is permissible:

Expert psychological testimony is permissible in cases involving incidents of child sexual abuse and an expert may state an opinion as to whether the child comports with the psychological and behavioral profile of a child sexual abuse victim, and may offer an opinion based on objective findings that the child has been sexually abused. Such an expert may not give an opinion as to whether he personally believes the child, nor an opinion as to whether the sexual assault was committed by the defendant, as these would improperly and prejudicially invade the province of the jury.

Furthermore, in syllabus point 5 of Mayhorn v. Logan Medical Foundation, ___ W. Va. ___, 454 S.E.2d 87 (1994) this Court stated:

"""Whether a witness is qualified to state an opinion is a matter which rests within the discretion of the trial court and its ruling on that point will not ordinarily be disturbed unless it clearly appears that its discretion has been abused." Point 5, syllabus, Overton v. Fields, 145 W. Va. 797 [117 S.E.2d 598 (1960)].' Syllabus Point 4, Hall v. Nello Teer Co., 157 W. Va. 582, 203 S.E.2d 145 (1974)." Syllabus Point 12,

Board of Education v. Zando, Martin & Milstead, 182 W. Va. 597, 390 S.E.2d 796 (1990).' Syl. pt. 3, Wilt v. Buracker, 191 W. Va. 39, 443 S.E.2d 196 (1993).

Appellant's contention that Ms. Brachna must have a certain educational background in order to testify as an expert on abused and assaulted children is misplaced. "[A] witness may be qualified as an expert by practical experience in a field of activity conferring special knowledge not shared by mankind in general[.]" Syl. pt. 2, in relevant part, State v. Baker, 180 W. Va. 233, 376 S.E.2d 127 (1988). For instance, in Cargill v. Balloon Works, Inc., 185 W. Va. 142, 405 S.E.2d 642 (1991), we found that a certified pilot of hot air balloons had a sufficient background regarding the operation, safety, construction and flight of hot air balloons to be qualified as an expert in the design and manufacture of a hot air balloon that crashed even though the pilot did not possess an engineering or design degree.

We concluded in Cargill that W. Va. R. Evid. 702, which enunciates the standard by which the qualification of an expert is determined, "cannot be interpreted to require . . . that the experience, education, or training of the individual be in complete congruence with the nature of the issue sought to be proven." Id. at 146-47, 405 S.E.2d at 646-47.See footnote 7 Instead, a witness may be qualified as an expert based upon his or her knowledge, skill, experience, training, or education. Board of Educ. v. Zando, Martin & Milstead, Inc., 182 W. Va. 597, 390 S.E.2d 796 (1990) (This Court held that a witness was qualified as an expert on structural matters even though he had not been educated as a structural engineer because of his experience in the construction business).

Thus, Ms. Brachna need not be a treating psychiatrist or psychologist as asserted by the appellant. The facts indicate that Ms. Brachna is a licensed social worker who works as a counselor with victimized children. Additionally, Ms. Brachna has a bachelor's degree in sociology and an uncompleted master's degree in behavioral disorders. Most importantly, the record reveals that Ms. Brachna has nine years of experience with troubled adolescent girls in group homes, and that she has seen more than one hundred abused and/or traumatized children.

As the State points out, other states have qualified non- psychologists as experts on abused and assaulted children because of their experience and training. See, e.g., People v. Pollard, 589 N.E.2d 175, 180 (Ill. App. Ct. 1992), appeal denied, 596 N.E.2d 635 (assault program worker, who was a foster mother specializing in sexually abused children); and Commonwealth v. Thayer, 634 N.E.2d 576 (Mass. 1994) (licensed psychiatric social worker). Accordingly, based on Ms. Brachna's training and experience of working with abused and traumatized children, the trial court did not abuse its discretion by qualifying Ms. Brachna as an expert on abused and assaulted children.

B.

The appellant next contends that Ms. Brachna's testimony regarding the truthfulness of Betty A.'s allegations violates syllabus point 7, in relevant part, of Edward Charles L., supra, which states: "Such an expert may not give an opinion as to whether he personally believes the child, nor an opinion as to whether the sexual assault was committed by the defendant, as these would improperly and prejudicially invade the province of the jury." As we previously explained, W. Va. R. Evid. 608(a) prohibits any testimony as to a witness's truthfulness on a particular occasion.

There are two questionable times in which Ms. Brachna's testimony borders on giving an opinion as to whether Betty A. was being truthful. The first incident occurred in the following exchange:

> Q [by the State] I do not want to relate specifically what [Betty A.] told you. That is not my purpose in having you testify. I only want you to inform this Court whether or not you made observations of [Betty A.] in her testimony which would cause you to be able to render to this Court an opinion as to whether or not [Betty A.] fit within the profile that you have previously described to this Court as that of a sexually abused child?
>
> A [by Ms. Brachna] Yes. When I do a taped interview, there are criteria I am watching and observing for. . . . [I]t . . . allows us to look back and check to see if the age and the emotion matches the trauma the child is reporting. One particular criterion I look for when doing this is if the child or adolescent uses age appropriate terminology for their body, their body parts, the alleged perpetrator's body parts[.] . . . I also start each taped interview with questions which helps me determine if the child can determine right from wrong, or more importantly, truth from a lie, or also show some type of suggestibility. . . . In [Betty A.'s] case, she was not highly suggestible. She maintained what she perceived as the truth. That helps me as a guideline to go on with my questioning. . . . When I'm looking for a child that's been coached, I'm looking for more -- either a street language or even maybe the correct terminology for genitalia, which she did not have or give me. Her knowledge of sexual acts seemed age appropriate. . . . To my opinion, she demonstrated an appropriate level of anxiety, meaning her emotion did reflect the trauma that she was reporting[.] . . . So, it was a very credible statement to me as far as those components that I look for.

(emphasis added). The second incident occurred after the State asked the following: "Was there anything . . . she said or her behavior or demeanor that would signal to you that there was something wrong with her statement, that there may be some falsity to it?" Ms. Brachna responded: "Not that I could tell. There was not what I would term as motive for her to give me that."

The appellant's trial attorney, however, did not object to the admission of the above statements nor did the trial judge give a cautionary instruction.See footnote 8 Therefore the admission of this testimony must invoke the plain error doctrine before we will reverse on this ground. As we previously stated, in order "[t]o trigger application of the 'plain error' doctrine, there must be (1) an error; (2) that is plain; (3) that affects substantial rights; and (4) seriously affects the fairness, integrity, or public reputation of the judicial proceedings." Syl. pt. 7, Miller, supra.

In the case before us, Ms. Brachna admitted, on cross- examination, that if a child were indeed lying, she would have no way of knowing, thereby neutralizing her prior testimony which suggested that she believed Betty A.'s allegations to be true. Thus, if

Ms. Brachna's testimony on direct examination was error, such error did not "seriously affect[ ] the fairness, integrity, or public reputation of the judicial proceedings." Syl. pt. 7, Miller, supra. See State v. Folse, 623 So.2d 59 (La. Ct. App. 1993) (The expert testified, without objection, on direct examination that he believed the victim was telling the truth about having been sexually abused; however, the court found that this did not violate rule 608 of the rules of evidence because the defendant's cross-examination corrected the direct testimony by making clear that the expert could not say whether or not the victim was telling the truth). Cf. United States v. Rosales, 19 F.3d 763 (1st Cir. 1994) (In a sexual abuse case the expert's testimony implicitly sent a message to the jury that the children had testified truthfully; however, review pursuant to the plain error doctrine was not warranted because the jury was presented with expert testimony which directly contradicted the objectional testimony and because the trial court instructed the jury that they were free to reject the opinions of the experts); United States v. Provost, 875 F.2d 172 (8th Cir. 1989), cert. denied, 493 U.S. 859 (The expert's testimony that two incidents described by the victim of a sexual assault "'both occurred"' was an isolated statement which did not constitute reversible error because it was harmless); Toledo, supra (An expert's statement in a case in which a child was kidnapped and sexually assaulted that the child's consistency in her story was "'consistent with a high likelihood that this occurred"' did not warrant review under the plain error doctrine because it is a close call and therefore not an obvious error affecting the fundamental fairness of the trial). Accordingly, because the appellant's trial counsel clarified that Ms. Brachna would have no idea whether a child was lying, the admission of Ms. Brachna's testimony regarding whether Betty A.'s allegations were truthful, if error, did not "seriously affect[ ] the fairness, integrity, or public reputation of the judicial proceedings" thereby implicating review pursuant to the plain error doctrine. Syl. pt. 7, Miller, supra.

C.

Although the appellant's brief is unclear, it appears that the appellant contends that the admission of expert testimony based upon a child sexual abuse profile is error. More specifically, the appellant asserts that the theory that sexually abused children manifest particular identifiable characteristics is not supported by accepted medical or scientific opinion as is required by W. Va. R. Evid. 702. See syl. pt. 2, Wilt v. Buracker, 191 W. Va. 39, 443 S.E.2d 196 (1993), cert. denied, ___ U.S. ___, 114 S. Ct. 2137 (1994) (This Court outlines how the admissibility of expert testimony should be analyzed pursuant to W. Va. R. Evid. 702).

However, as the appellant concedes, this Court held the following in syllabus point 7 of Edward Charles L., supra, in relevant part, regarding the admission of expert testimony on the profiles of child sexual abuse victims:

Expert psychological testimony is permissible in cases involving incidents of child sexual abuse and an expert may state an opinion as to whether the child comports with the psychological and behavioral profile of a child sexual abuse victim, and may offer an opinion based on objective findings that the child has been sexually abused.

We decline to revisit our holding in Edward Charles L., supra.See footnote 9 Accordingly, the admission of Ms. Brachna's testimony regarding the psychological and behavioral profile of a child sexual abuse victim was not error.See footnote 10

IV.

The appellant asserts that he was denied his right to effective assistance of counsel under the sixth amendment to the United States Constitution and under Article III, § 14 of the West Virginia Constitution.

We recently explained why addressing ineffective assistance of counsel claims on direct appeal is usually inappropriate: "In cases involving ineffective assistance on direct appeals, intelligent review is rendered impossible because the most significant witness, the trial attorney, has not been given the opportunity to explain the motive and reason behind his or her trial behavior." Miller, at ___, ___ S.E.2d at ___ (slip op. at 22) (footnote omitted). See also State v. Triplett, 187 W. Va. 760, 771, 421 S.E.2d 511, 522 (1992) ("it is the extremely rare case when this Court will find ineffective assistance of counsel when such a charge is raised as an assignment of error on a direct appeal"). When addressing an ineffective assistance of counsel claim, however, the following analysis should be used:

5. In the West Virginia courts, claims of ineffective assistance of counsel are to be governed by the two-pronged test established in Strickland v. Washington, 466 U.S. 668, 104 S. Ct. 2052, 80 L. Ed. 2d 674 (1984): (1) Counsel's performance was deficient under an objective standard of reasonableness; and (2) there is a reasonable probability that, but for counsel's unprofessional errors, the result of the proceedings would have been different.

6. In reviewing counsel's performance, courts must apply an objective standard and determine whether, in light of all the circumstances, the identified acts or omissions were outside the broad range of professionally competent assistance while at the same time refraining from engaging in hindsight or second-guessing of trial counsel's strategic decisions. Thus, a reviewing court asks whether a reasonable lawyer would have acted, under the circumstances, as defense counsel acted in the case at issue.

Syl. pts. 5 and 6, Miller, supra.

In the case before us, the appellant asserts that his trial counsel was ineffective because he, inter alia,: (1) failed to call character witnesses or any other witnesses other than the appellant; (2) failed to object to Mr. Pace's testimony which was previously discussed in this opinion; (3) failed to object to Ms. Brachna's testimony on whether Betty A.'s allegations against the appellant were true; (4) failed to call an expert who would attest that appellant's psychological profile would suggest that he did not commit the crimes charged; (5) failed to have the trial court give a cautionary instruction that the testimony of Ms. Riley, who, as we previously stated, was qualified as an expert on abused and assaulted children, regarding the hearsay statements made by Betty A., was only being offered to show the basis of her opinion and was not being offered to support the truth of what Betty A. said; (6) failed to request that Betty A. undergo psychological evaluation in order to see if there were psychological problems which may make her testify falsely; (7) failed to offer a jury instruction which stated that Betty A.'s testimony should be scrutinized with caution since it was uncorroborated; and (8) failed to offer any evidence of mitigating circumstances at appellant's sentencing hearing.

However, as the State points out, there may have been tactical reasons for appellant's trial counsel's lack of action. For instance, there may not have been any witnesses who could testify as to appellant's character pursuant to W. Va. R. Evid. 404(a)(1)See footnote 11 nor may there have been any evidence of mitigating circumstances to offer at appellant's sentencing hearing. Our review of the record does not reveal "whether, in light of all the circumstances, the identified acts or omissions [of the appellant's trial counsel] were outside the broad range of professionally competent assistance . . . [without] engaging in hindsight or second-guessing of [appellant's trial counsel's] strategic decisions." Syl. pt. 6, in part, Miller, supra. As we stated in Miller, at ___, ___ S.E.2d at ___ (slip op. at 29), "[i]t is apparent that we intelligently cannot determine the merits of this ineffective assistance claim without an adequate record giving trial counsel the courtesy of being able to explain his trial actions." Accordingly, we decline to further address this issue on direct appeal.

V.

The appellant asserts that the trial judge violated ex post facto principles found in W. Va. Const. art. III, § 4 and U. S. Const. art. I, § 10See footnote 12 by sentencing him to serve a term of not less than fifteen nor more than thirty-five years in prison for sexual assault pursuant to W. Va. Code, 61-8B-3(b) which was effective on July 1, 1991. The appellant contends that the 1984 version of W. Va. Code, 61-8B-3(b), which provides for a term of "not less than fifteen nor more than twenty-five years[,]" is the applicable Code section because the indictment charges that he committed the crimes in 1989.

Similarly, on the incest charges, the appellant was sentenced to a prison term of not less than five years nor more than fifteen years pursuant to W. Va. Code, 61-8-12(c) which was effective in 1991. In that the appellant was charged with committing incest in 1989, the appellant contends that he should have been sentenced according to the 1986 version of W. Va. Code, 61-8-12(c) which provides for a term of not less than five years nor more than ten years.

This Court held the following in syllabus points 6 and 7 of State ex rel. Collins v. Bedell, No. 22781, ___ W. Va. ___, ___ S.E.2d ___ (June 19, 1995):

6. 'Under ex post facto principles of the United States and West Virginia Constitutions, a law passed after the commission of an offense which increases the punishment, lengthens the sentence or operates to the detriment of the accused, cannot be applied to him.' Syl. pt. 1, Adkins v. Bordenkircher, 164 W. Va. 292, 262 S.E.2d 885 (1980).

7. A procedural change in a criminal proceeding does not violate the ex post facto principles found in the W. Va. Const. art. III, § 4 and in the U. S. Const. art. I, § 10 unless the procedural change alters the definition of a crime so that what is currently punished as a crime was an innocent act when committed; deprives the accused of a defense which existed when the crime was committed; or increases the punishment for the crime after it was committed.

(emphasis added). Clearly, applying the 1991 versions of W. Va. Code, 61-8B-3(b) and 61-8-12(c) increased the appellant's punishment, thus, violating the ex post facto principles found in the W. Va. Const. and U. S. Const. Accordingly, we reverse the sentences imposed upon the appellant and remand this case to the circuit court for resentencing in accordance with this opinion.

VI.

In summary, we reverse appellant's sentences on the sexual assault counts and incest counts, and remand this case to the circuit court for resentencing in accordance with this opinion. Otherwise, we affirm the appellant's conviction.

Affirmed, in part; reversed, in part; and remanded.

Footnote: 1 Since this case involves sensitive matters, we follow our traditional practice and use only the last initial of the juvenile involved in this case. See State v. Michael S., 188 W. Va. 229, 230 n. 1, 423 S.E.2d 632, 633 n. 1 (1992). (citation omitted).

Footnote: 2 Though the record describes the sexual acts in graphic detail, considering our resolution of the issues in this case, it is not necessary to recount those facts in detail in this opinion.

Footnote: 3 Ms. Riley is working as a psychologist under the supervision of Dr. Betsy Evans until she obtains a license in psychology.

Footnote: 4 We held the following in syllabus point 2 of State v. Stewart, 187 W. Va. 422, 419 S.E.2d 683 (1992): ""Error in the admission of testimony to which no objection was made will not be considered by this Court on appeal or writ of error, but will be treated as waived." Syl. Pt. 4, State v. Michael, 141 W. Va. 1, 87 S.E.2d 595 (1955).' Syllabus point 7, State v. Davis, 176 W. Va. 454, 345 S.E.2d 549 (1986)." However, W. Va. R. Evid. 103(d) states that "[n]othing in this rule precludes taking notice of plain errors affecting substantial rights although they were not brought to the attention of the court."

Footnote: 5 W. Va. R. Evid. 608(a) states, in relevant part, "[t]he credibility of a witness may be attacked or supported by evidence in the form of opinion or reputation[.]"

W. Va. R. Evid. 609(a) states, in pertinent part, that the credibility of an accused in a criminal case may be attacked by "evidence that the accused has been convicted of a crime . . . but only if the crime involved perjury or false swearing." The credibility of a witness other than the accused may be attacked by "evidence that the witness has been convicted of a crime . . . subject to Rule 403 . . . if the crime was punishable by death or imprisonment in excess of one year . . . and . . . [by] evidence that the witness has been convicted of a crime . . . [involving] dishonesty or false statement, regardless of the punishment." Id.

W. Va. R. Evid. 608(b) states, in relevant part, that "[s]pecific instances of the conduct of a witness, for the purpose of attacking or supporting the witness' credibility, other than conviction of crime as provided in Rule 609, may not be proved by extrinsic evidence. They may, however, in the discretion of the court, if probative of truthfulness or untruthfulness, be inquired into on cross-examination of a witness other than the accused (1) concerning the witness' character for truthfulness or untruthfulness, or (2) concerning the character for truthfulness or untruthfulness of another witness as to which character the witness being cross-examined has testified."

W. Va. R. Evid. 613(b) states, in pertinent part, that "[e]xtrinsic evidence of a prior inconsistent statement by a witness is not admissible unless the witness is afforded an opportunity to explain or deny the same and the opposite party is afforded an opportunity to interrogate the witness thereon, or the interest of justice otherwise require."

Footnote: 6 At least one court has noted that if a witness's character for truthfulness is eventually attacked during the trial after opening statements which indicate that the credibility of a witness will be attacked, then the admission of the testimony of a witness's truthful character before such attack is harmless error. United States v. Beaty, 722 F.2d 1090, 1097 (3d Cir. 1983) ("'In view of the inevitability of defense counsels' attack on [the witnesses'] credibility and the formidable assault which in fact was made in the defense openings, cross-examinations and summations, the error in the timing of the introduction of the [truthfulness promise] does not require reversal in this case[:]" the prosecutor elicited on direct examination that the witness had promised to tell the truth in connection with a plea bargain (citation omitted)).

Subsequent to Mr. Pace's testimony, the appellant's trial counsel did attack Betty A.'s character for truthfulness. Therefore, the State asserts that since Mr. Pace's testimony regarding Betty A.'s character for truthfulness would have been admissible once the appellant's trial counsel attacked her character for truthfulness, the admission of Mr. Pace's testimony in the facts before us was harmless error.

However, unlike the case above, the prosecutor had no indication in the opening statement of the appellant's trial attorney that Betty A.'s credibility would be attacked. Thus, it is arguable whether the appellant would have attacked Betty A.'s credibility if the prosecutor had not delved into the issue during Mr. Pace's testimony. Moreover, we do not condone this type of questioning because it could still amount to error which is not harmless depending on the totality of the circumstances in a given case.

Footnote: 7 W. Va. R. Evid. 702 states:

Testimony by Experts. If scientific, technical, or other specialized knowledge will assist the trier of fact to understand the evidence or to determine a fact in issue, a witness qualified as an expert by knowledge, skill, experience, training, or education may testify thereto in the form of an opinion or otherwise.*

Additionally, this Court held the following in syl. pt. 4 of Mayhorn, supra:

Pursuant to West Virginia Rules of Evidence 702 an expert's opinion is admissible if the basic methodology employed by the expert in arriving at his opinion is scientifically or technically valid and properly applied. The jury, and not the trial judge, determines the weight to be given to the expert's opinion.

Footnote: 8 The trial judge did in his charge to the jury give the following instruction submitted by the appellant:

The jury is instructed that the rules of evidence ordinarily do not permit witnesses to testify as to opinions or conclusions. An exception to this rule exists as to those whom we call 'expert witnesses.' Witnesses who, by education and experience, have become expert in some art, science, profession, or calling, may state their opinions as to relevant and material matter, in which they have been qualified to be expert, and may also state their reasons for the opinion.

You should consider each expert opinion received in evidence in this case, and give it such weight as you may think it deserves. If you should decided [sic] that the opinion of an expert witness is not based upon sufficient education and experience, or if you should conclude that the reason given in support of the opinion is not sound or if you feel that it is outweighed by other evidence, you may disregard the opinion entirely.

Footnote: 9 We recognize that the admission of expert testimony regarding the child sexual abuse profile is a disputed point. Justice Miller has written a very detailed dissent to Edward Charles L., supra, regarding this issue. However, the majority opinion in Edward Charles L., which authorizes the admission of such testimony, has not been overruled.

Footnote: 10 Although it is not clear, the appellant also appears to argue that Ms. Brachna did not provide a basis for her knowledge of the sexual assault profile. However, as the State points out, W. Va. R. Evid. 705 does not require the expert to disclose the underlying facts or data which support his or her opinion unless the trial court requires the disclosure or unless during cross-examination he or she is asked to disclose that information:

Rule 705. Disclosure of Facts or Data Underlying Expert Opinion. The expert may testify in terms of opinion or inference and give reasons therefor without first testifying to the underlying facts or data, unless the court requires otherwise. The expert may in any event be required to disclose the underlying facts or data on cross-examination.*

Moreover, appellant's assertion that Ms. Brachna's one- time interview with Betty A. was insufficient to enable Ms. Brachna to form an expert opinion, and appellant's assertion that Ms. Brachna failed to conduct a full-scale psychological and developmental evaluation of the child and underlying family dynamics are more appropriately explored through cross- examination which allows the trier of fact to weigh the credibility of the expert's opinion rather than on appeal. Cf. 2 Franklin D. Cleckley, Handbook on Evidence for West Virginia Lawyers, § 7-2(A)(1) at 28 (3d ed. 1994) ("Should the [expert] witness later fail to adequately define or describe the relevant standard of care, opposing counsel is free to explore that weakness in the testimony. The trier of fact may then choose to discount the testimony." (citations omitted)).

Footnote: 11 W. Va. R. Evid. 404(a)(1) states, in relevant part, that "[e]vidence of a person's character or a trait of character is not admissible for the purpose of proving that he or she acted in conformity therewith on a particular occasion, except: (1) Character of Accused.--Evidence of a pertinent trait of his character offered by an accused, or by the prosecutor to rebut the same[.]"

Footnote: 12 The W. Va. Const. art. III, § 4 states, in relevant part: "No . . . ex post facto law . . . shall be passed." The U. S. Const. art. I, § 10 provides, in relevant part: "No State shall . . . pass any . . . ex post facto Law[.]"

1. "In determining whether to grant a rule to show cause in prohibition when a court is not acting in excess of its jurisdiction, this Court will look to the adequacy of other available remedies such as appeal and to the over-all economy of effort and money among litigants, lawyers and courts; however, this Court will use prohibition in this discretionary way to correct only substantial, clear-cut, legal errors plainly in contravention of a clear statutory, constitutional, or common law mandate which may be resolved independently of any disputed facts and only in cases where there is a high probability that the trial will be completely reversed if the error is not corrected in advance." Syllabus Point 1, Hinkle v. Black, 164 W.Va. 112, 262 S.E.2d 744 (1979).

2. Neither the statutory limitation created by W.Va. Code, 57-2-3 [1965], nor a protective order under Rule 26(c) of the West Virginia Rules of Civil Procedure, provide the "use immunity" protection that permits a court to require a person to answer questions in civil discovery, over a constitutional objection based on the Fifth Amendment to the United States Constitution and Article III, Section 5 of the West Virginia Constitution, where the answers to the questions may be self-incriminating.

CHIEF JUSTICE STARCHER delivered the Opinion of the Court:

In the instant case, we issue a writ of prohibition barring the enforcement of an order by the Circuit Court of Kanawha County. The order prohibited David and Christopher Wright from refusing to answer questions in a civil deposition based on their constitutional right not to give self-incriminating testimony.

I. Facts and Background

George Smoot, a minor (by his mother Marcella Gherke), filed a lawsuit against the petitioners David Wright and Christopher Wright, for injuries that George Smoot allegedly sustained in an assault. Criminal charges were also filed against the Wrights in connection with the alleged assault.

The Wrights agreed to respond to discovery requests in the Smoot/Gherke civil case, on the condition that the Wrights' criminal case was resolved by the time their discovery response in the civil case was due. When the criminal case was not resolved by the due date for the discovery responses, the circuit court (in the civil case) granted the Wrights a protective order, under Rule 26(c) of the West Virginia Rules of Civil Procedure,[1998] See footnote 1 excusing the Wrights from answering written discovery requests, based on the Wrights' assertion of their constitutional protection against compelled self- incrimination (we shall refer to this as their "self-incrimination right").

However, the circuit court denied the Wrights' request for a protective order with respect to their depositions. The circuit court concluded that W.Va. Code, 57-2-3 [1965] See footnote 2 would protect the Wrights' self-incrimination right in the depositions -- and that therefore the Wrights could not refuse to answer questions posed to them in their civil depositions based upon their self-incrimination right. The circuit court also sealed and prohibited the distribution of the transcripts of the Wrights' depositions, and prohibited the dissemination of information obtained in those depositions. See footnote 3

The Wrights filed a writ of prohibition with this Court, seeking to prevent the enforcement of that portion of the circuit court's order that bars the Wrights from refusing to answer deposition questions based on their self-incrimination right.

II. Standard of Review

This Court addressed the standard for determining the appropriateness of a writ of prohibition in Syllabus Point 1 of Hinkle v. Black, 164 W.Va. 112, 262 S.E.2d 744 (1979):

> In determining whether to grant a rule to show cause in prohibition when a court is not acting in excess of its jurisdiction, this Court will look to the adequacy of other available remedies such as appeal and to the over-all economy of effort and money among litigants, lawyers and courts; however, this Court will use prohibition in this discretionary way to correct only substantial, clear-cut, legal errors plainly in contravention of a clear statutory, constitutional, or common law mandate which may be resolved independently of any disputed facts and only in cases where there is a high probability that the trial will be completely reversed if the error is not corrected in advance.

(Emphasis added.)

Additionally, we stated in Syllabus Points 2 and 3 of State ex rel. U.S. Fidelity and Guar. Co. v. Canady, 194 W.Va. 431, 460 S.E.2d 677 (1995):

> 2. "'A writ of prohibition is available to correct a clear legal error resulting from a trial court's substantial abuse of its discretion in regard to discovery orders.' > 3. When a discovery order involves the probable invasion of confidential materials that are exempted from discovery under Rule 26(b)(1) and (3) of the West Virginia Rules of Civil Procedure, the exercise of this Court's original jurisdiction is appropriate.

Our review of legal issues in a writ of prohibition, of course, is de novo.

III. Discussion

The Fifth Amendment to the United States Constitution and Article III, Section 5 of the West Virginia Constitution prohibit the compelling of self-incriminating testimony in both criminal and civil proceedings -- unless neither the testimony nor its fruits are available in a criminal proceeding. See Syllabus Point 1, State ex rel. Osburn v. Cole, 173 W.Va. 596, 319 S.E.2d 364 (1983). See also State v. Beard, 203 W.Va. 325, 507 S.E.2d 688 (1998); State ex rel. Palumbo v. Graley's Body Shop, Inc., 188 W.Va. 501, 425 S.E.2d 177 (1992). See footnote 4

This constitutionally-based limitation on the use of compelled, self- incriminating testimony is commonly known as "use immunity." Beard, supra.

A related, statutorily-based limitation on the evidentiary use of certain self-incriminating statements is created by W.Va. Code, 57-2-3 [1965]. This statute, which was relied upon by the circuit court in the instant case, states:

> In a criminal prosecution other than for perjury or false swearing, evidence shall not be given against the accused of any statement made by him as a witness upon a legal examination.

We have never held that the limitation on the use of certain statements that is created by W.Va. Code, 57-2-3 [1965] is as broad as or co-extensive with constitutionally- based "use immunity." The language of W.Va. Code, 57-2-3 [1965] addresses only the admissibility of a statement in court, and does not address a statement's possible "use" for other purposes related to a criminal investigation or prosecution. See footnote 5

Similarly, while a circuit court under Rule 26(c) has the power to grant a protective order limiting the use of a civil deposition -- as the circuit court did in the instant case -- it does not appear that we have ever held that such an order confers broad criminal "use immunity" with respect to the contents of the statement. Nor have we held that such a protective order necessarily binds or limits the rights of parties who are strangers to the litigation -- such as public criminal investigators and prosecutors.

Other courts addressing the issue have consistently held that a civil protective order sealing a deposition does not automatically bar the obtaining or use of the deposition in a criminal context. See, e.g., In Re Grand Jury Subpoena, 836 F.2d 1468 (4th Cir. 1988), cert. denied, 487 U.S. 1240, 108 S. Ct. 2914, 101 L.Ed.2d 945 (1988), where the court held that the issuance of a Rule 26 protective order in a civil proceeding is not grounds to quash a grand jury subpoena for the deposition transcript. See footnote 6

In a statement that is particularly pertinent to the instant case, the Fourth Circuit in In Re Grand Jury Subpoena said:

> In contrast with a grant of immunity, the government may not use a protective order to compel a witness to testify during a criminal or civil proceeding. Absent a grant of immunity, the deponents were entitled, with or without a protective order, to assert their fifth amendment privilege in answer to potentially incriminating questions in a civil proceeding.

836 F.2d at 1471 (emphasis added).

We conclude from the foregoing discussion that neither the statutory limitation created by W.Va. Code, 57-2-3 [1965], nor a protective order under Rule 26(c) of the West Virginia Rules of Civil Procedure, provide the "use immunity" protection that permits a court to require a person to answer questions in civil discovery, over a constitutional objection based on the Fifth Amendment to the United States Constitution and Article III, Section 5 of the West Virginia Constitution, where the answers to the questions may be self- incriminating.

In the instant case, the circuit court's order that is challenged by the petitioners was premised on the court's conclusion that the petitioners -- by virtue of the court's Rule 26(c) protective order and the limitations imposed by W.Va. Code, 57-2-3 [1965] -- would have an immunity with respect to their answers to deposition questions that was fully protective of their constitutional self-incrimination right.

Because we have held that this legal conclusion by the circuit court was erroneous, we must find that the circuit court erred in issuing its order based upon such a premise. We therefore grant the requested writ and prohibit the enforcement of the circuit court's order to the extent that the order requires the petitioners to make discovery responses -- including the giving of answers to questions at depositions -- over the petitioners' bona fide assertion of the constitutional right to remain silent about information that might tend to be self-incriminating. See footnote 7

Writ Granted as Moulded.

Footnote: 1 Rule of Civil Procedure 26(c) [1998] states in pertinent part: the court . . . may make any order which justice requires to protect a party or person from annoyance, embarrassment, oppression, or undue burden or expense . . .

Footnote: 2 W.Va. Code, 57-2-3 [1965] states: In a criminal prosecution other than for perjury or false swearing, evidence shall not be given against the accused of any statement made by him as a witness upon a legal examination.

Footnote: 3 The circuit court's order, in pertinent part, read as follows: The Court, after hearing arguments of counsel and after review of the record with respect to the Motion for Protective Order, does find that the deposition testimony sought by the Plaintiff is protected under West Virginia Code §57-2-3, and does, accordingly DENY the Defendants' Motion for a Protective Order regarding the scheduled depositions of David and Christopher Wright. The Court, further finds that the written discovery, which is currently outstanding to the Defendants, is not protected by West Virginia Code §57-2-3 as a legal examination, and does, accordingly GRANT the Defendants' Motion for a Protective Order with regard to the outstanding written discovery requests.

The Court further Orders that the transcripts of David and Christopher Wrights' deposition be used only in the context of this civil action and further distribution and/or dissemination is strictly prohibited. The only exception to this prohibition is for the limited purposes of providing copies of the transcript to the Defendants' criminal attorney, Thomas Patrick Maroney. The Court further Orders that all persons attending the deposition of the Defendants are prohibited from discussing or disseminating any information gleaned from the Defendants at their civil depositions outside of the context of prosecuting this civil action.

The Court further Orders that a civil deposition does constitute a legal examination under West Virginia Code § 57-2-3, and does thereby Order that the Defendants will not be permitted to assert their Fifth Amendment right against self incrimination with respect to questions posed to them during their civil depositions. The Court further Orders that the Defendants be required to fully respond to all questions properly posed to them pursuant to the West Virginia Rules of Civil Procedure, to which there are no valid objections.

Footnote: 4 Additionally, compelled testimony in a criminal proceeding implicates "transactional immunity" with respect to the subject matter of the testimony. See W.Va. Code, 57-5-2 [1923].

Footnote: 5 In State v. Price, 113 W.Va. 326, 328, 167 S.E. 862, 863 (1933), we stated: This is a time-honored statutory provision. We inherited it from the mother state. Code of Virginia 1860, chapter 199, section 22. The rule is thus applied in State v. Hall, 31 W. Va. 505, 7 S. E. 422: "No statement made by one accused of crime, while a witness testifying on his own behalf before a justice on his preliminary examination, can be used against him on his trial."

None of our cases appear to discuss how W.Va. Code, 57-2-3 [1965] "interfaces" with constitutional self-incrimination jurisprudence -- but the statute appears to arise out of the same principles that animate the constitutional protection.

Footnote: 6 The Ninth Circuit (In Re Grand Jury Subpoena, 62 F.3d 1222 (9th Cir. 1995)) and the Eleventh Circuit (In Re Grand Jury Proceedings (Williams) v. U.S., 995 F.2d 1013 (11th Cir. 1993)), take the same approach as the 4th Circuit, holding that Rule 26 protective orders may always be overcome by a grand jury subpoena. Taking an opposite approach, the Second Circuit requires the government to show a "compelling need" to enforce a grand jury subpoena for sealed civil discovery. Martindell v. ITT, 594 F.2d 291 (2d Cir. 1979). The First Circuit takes a middle-ground approach, placing the burden on the person seeking to avoid the subpoena to show that it should not be enforced. In Re Grand Jury Subpoena, 138 F.3d 442 (1st Cir. 1998).

Footnote: 7 The balancing of the self-incrimination right vis-a-vis other rights in civil proceedings is a complex area of jurisprudence. A wide array of options are available to courts in performing this balancing. See generally Osburn, supra, 173 W.Va. at 598 n.5, 319 S.E.2d at 366 n.5; Wright and Miller, Federal Practice and Procedure, Chapter 6, "Depositions and Discovery," Section 2018, "Privilege Against Self-Incrimination;" Mark Youngelson, "The Use of 26(c) Protective Orders: 'Pleading the Fifth' Without Suffering Adverse Consequences," 1994 Ann.Surv.Am.L. 245; Gerald W. Heller, "Is 'Pleading the Fifth' a Civil Matter? How the Constitution's Self-Incrimination Clause Presents Special Challenges for the Civil Litigator," 42 Federal Lawyer 27 (September 1995).

Mindful that there are many permutations of this balancing act, with varying equities in each permutation, in this opinion we deliberately go only as far as is necessary to resolve the narrow issue before us. We express no opinion as to what options may be properly employed by the circuit court in any balancing that is necessary in the underlying lawsuit in the instant case.

We do, however, observe that not every question at a deposition -- or request for admission, or document request, or other discovery request -- will necessarily require a response that in its entirety is potentially self-incriminating. It would seem therefore that the self-incrimination right, if it is asserted, should ordinarily be asserted in response to specific questions or other specific discovery requests -- as opposed to a blanket objection to a form of discovery -- unless such a procedure would be demonstrably futile.

Additionally, we observe that in some circumstances, a party may permissibly be required to risk adverse consequences in civil proceedings, as a result of their silence based on the assertion of their right against compelled self-incrimination. See Syllabus Point 2, West Virginia Dept. of Health and Human Resources ex rel. Wright v. Doris S., 197 W.Va. 489, 475 S.E.2d 865 (1996) (silence can lead to adverse inference in child abuse and neglect proceedings); see generally Osburn, supra, and the discussion of this issue in the other authorities noted supra in this footnote.

SYLLABUS BY THE COURT

1. "A child has a right to continued association with individuals with whom he has formed a close emotional bond, including foster parents, provided that a determination is made that such continued contact is in the best interests of the child." Syllabus Point 11, In re Jonathan G., 198 W.Va. 716, 482 S.E.2d 893 (1996).

2. "The best interests of a child are served by preserving important relationships in that child's life." Syllabus Point 2, State ex rel. Treadway v. McCoy, 189 W.Va. 210, 429 S.E.2d 492 (1993).

3. "It is a traumatic experience for children to undergo sudden and dramatic changes in their permanent custodians. Lower courts in cases such as these should provide, whenever possible, for a gradual transition period, especially where young children are involved. Further, such gradual transition periods should be developed in a manner intended to foster the emotional adjustment of the children to this change and to maintain as much stability as possible in their lives." Per Curiam:

The guardian ad litem for the child Jesse R. and the former foster parents of Jesse R. -- Sherry and Larry R. -- together appeal a December 10, 1997 order of the Circuit Court of Nicholas County. The circuit court's order denied Sherry and Larry R.'s request for visitation with Jesse R. We vacate the circuit court's order and remand this case for an evidentiary hearing regarding allegations of sexual abuse that were made against Sherry and Larry R. Following this hearing, the circuit court should reconsider the visitation issue, in light of the best interests of Jesse R.

I.

In 1994, Jesse R., See footnote 1 then 4 years old, was removed from his biological mother's custody by an emergency petition and order of the court, and placed in the custody of the West Virginia Department of Health and Human Resources ("DHHR"). Following an abuse and neglect proceeding, the biological mother relinquished her parental rights, and the legal custody of Jesse R. was placed in the DHHR. See footnote 2

Jesse R.'s biological father, Todd H., was not a party to the abuse and neglect proceeding. However, Todd H. subsequently voluntarily relinquished his parental rights, so that Jesse R. could be adopted by his foster parents, Sherry and Larry R.

Sherry and Larry R. subsequently began proceedings to adopt Jesse R. All of the necessary steps for the adoption had been completed and the final paperwork was being prepared when -- in October of 1997 -- a teenaged girl whom Sherry and Larry R. had assisted over the years accused Sherry and Larry R. of sexually abusing her.

As a result of these accusations, after being with his foster parents Sherry and Larry R. for approximately 3 years, Jesse R. was removed from this home by the DHHR. The record indicates that the accusations of sexual abuse of the teenaged girl by Sherry R., were later retracted by the girl, and that the judge was aware of this recantation. The record before this Court in the instant case contains no further information about any proceedings regarding the girl's accusations of sexual abuse.

After Jesse R. was removed from their home, Sherry and Larry R. filed a motion in the circuit court seeking visitation with Jesse R. The circuit court held a hearing on December 10, 1997. In findings of fact, the circuit judge stated that he did "not know if visitation with Mr. and Mrs. [R.] would be beneficial or detrimental to the infant respondent Jesse . . . at this time." However, the circuit judge went on to conclude that it was in the best interests of Jesse R. not to permit visitation.

Sherry and Larry R. appeal the circuit court's decision to this Court, joined by the guardian ad litem, and contend that visitation of Jesse R. by Sherry and Larry R. would be in the best interests of Jesse R.

II.

This Court has repeatedly recognized the needs of children whose custodial situation has been altered to have continued contact with individuals with whom the children have formed an emotional bond.

For example, we have held that visitation should be permitted between a child and her stepfather and half-brother, Honaker v. Burnside, 182 W.Va. 448, 388 S.E.2d 322 (1989); that circuit courts should consider whether continued association with siblings in other placements following an abuse and neglect proceeding would be in a child's best interest, James M. v. Maynard, 185 W.Va. 648, 408 S.E.2d 400 (1991); that visitation rights may be granted to a parent whose parental rights have been terminated due to abuse or neglect proceedings, In re Christina L., 194 W.Va. 446, 460 S.E.2d 692 (1995); and that a child has a right to continued association with a foster parent after being placed with natural parents, if the contact is in the best interest of the child, In re Jonathan G., 198 W.Va. 716, 482 S.E.2d 893 (1996).

Regarding continued association with foster parents, this Court has stated:

> A child has a right to continued association with individuals with whom he has formed a close emotional bond, including foster parents, provided that a determination is made that such continued contact is in the best interests of the child.

Syllabus Point 11, In re Jonathan G., 198 W.Va. 716, 482 S.E.2d 893 (1996).

We have held:

> It is a traumatic experience for children to undergo sudden and dramatic changes in their permanent custodians. Lower courts in cases such as these should provide, whenever possible, for a gradual transition period, especially where young children are involved. Further, such gradual transition periods should be developed in a manner intended to foster the emotional adjustment of the children to this change and to maintain as much stability as possible in their lives.

Syllabus Point 3, James M. v. Maynard, 185 W.Va. 648, 408 S.E.2d 400 (1991).

Clearly "[t]he best interests of a child are served by preserving important relationships in that child's life." Syllabus Point 2, State ex rel. Treadway v. McCoy, 189 W.Va. 210, 429 S.E.2d 492 (1993).

Sherry and Larry R. were the foster parents of Jesse R. for approximately 3 years and had formed a significant relationship with the child. See footnote 3 It appears that Jesse R. was removed from the one stable home he had known, and was placed elsewhere, without any type of transition and without affording his foster parents any visitation.

Applying the foregoing principles, we conclude that the circuit court did not have a sufficient record to support its determination to deny visitation to the appellants. Consequently, such a denial was an abuse of the circuit court's discretion.

We are troubled that the circuit court did not consider, examine and weigh any evidence concerning the alleged sexual abuse. See footnote 4 Instead, it appears that the circuit court relied upon the mere fact of (retracted) allegations of abuse of another child to deny Sherry and Larry R. visitation with Jesse R.

We reverse the circuit court's order of December 10, 1997. We remand this case to the Circuit Court of Nicholas County with directions to conduct an evidentiary hearing. The circuit court should determine, inter alia, what evidence if any exists supporting the allegations of sexual abuse against Sherry R. We further require the circuit court to re-examine the issue of visitation, in light of the evidence adduced at the hearing and the principles enunciated in this opinion, and to make full findings of fact and conclusions of law on the issue of whether visitation by Sherry and Larry R. would be in the best interests of Jesse R.

Reversed and Remanded with Directions.

Footnote: 1 Consistent with our general practice, we use initials rather than full names in cases involving sensitive matters. See In re Jonathan P., 182 W.Va. 302, 303 n. 1, 387 S.E.2d 537, 538 n. 1 (1989).

Footnote: 2 Jesse R.'s half brother, Zachary, then aged 12, was also removed from his mother's custody.

Footnote: 3 Dr. Christina Arco, Ph.D., a licensed psychologist, examined Jesse R. for adoption purposes just a few months before he was removed from Sherry and Larry R.'s home. Dr. Arco stated in her report that Jesse R. deserved to stay with the R.'s "where [Jesse] feels safe, secure, and loved for the first time in his young lifetime."

Footnote: 4 While this appeal only addresses the circuit court's denial of Sherry and Larry R.'s motion for visitation, we note that the legislature has established rules and guidelines for the removal of children from foster homes. These guidelines are found in W.Va. Code, 49-2-14 [1995] it provides, in pertinent part:
(a) The state department may temporarily remove a child from a foster home based on an allegation of abuse or neglect, including sexual abuse, that occurred while the child resided in the home. If the department determines that reasonable cause exists to support the allegation, the department shall remove all foster children from the arrangement and preclude contact between the children and the foster parents. If, after investigation, the allegation is determined to be true by the department or after a judicial proceeding a court finds the allegation to be true or if the foster parents fail to contest the allegation in writing within twenty calendar days of receiving written notice of said allegations, the department shall permanently terminate all foster care arrangements with said foster parents: Provided, That if the state department determines that the abuse occurred due to no act or failure to act on the part of the foster parents and that continuation of the foster care arrangement is in the best interests of the child, the department may, in its discretion, elect not to terminate the foster care arrangement or arrangements.

(b) When a child has been placed in a foster care arrangement for a period in excess of eighteen consecutive months and the state department determines that the placement is a fit and proper place for the child to reside, the foster care arrangement may not be terminated unless such termination is in the best interest of the child and:

(1) The foster care arrangement is terminated pursuant to subsection (a) of this section;

(2) The foster care arrangement is terminated due to the child being returned to his or her parent or parents;(3) The foster care arrangement is terminated due to the child being united or reunited with a sibling or siblings;

(4) The foster parent or parents agree to the termination in writing;

(5) The foster care arrangement is terminated at the written request of a foster child who has attained the age of fourteen; or

(6) A circuit court orders the termination upon a finding that the state department has developed a more suitable long-term placement for the child upon hearing evidence in a proceeding brought by the department seeking removal and transfer.
